Volga German Recipes

by Marjorie Sackett

In 1972 students in my class in Folk Recipes produced a booklet of the recipes they had collected. The following is the introduction to that booklet, written collaboratively by the students:

During harvest time father, mother, hired hands, and children (schoolage), hired girl (if they had one), arose at 4:30 a.m. to begin the preparations for the meal and the harvest job. Not only did bread have to be baked, chickens dressed, potatoes peeled, house put in order, etc., but outside chores had to be done, including the feeding of the horses. Horses did not get a 10 o'clock lunch, nor a 4 o'clock lunch; they were fed again at noon. They had to have time for a good morning meal, as much hard work was done by the animals.

In an interview with Mrs. John Augustine of Ellis, she referred to when she and her husband worked long hours in the harvest fields. Since there were fourteen children, it was necessary to have a bountiful crop each year. She also referred to the fact that the older female members of the family took care of the young babies while the parents and the boys worked long hours in the fields. One thing that was not forgotten was that when Mrs. Augustine made her bread, she had to make eight loaves, which did not last very long....

Mrs. Domatilla Pfannenstiel's husband said that at 10 o'clock, fresh bread (sliced) and sliced raw onion in vinegar and salt, black hot coffee, and schviele mouldosh of a sort, surely did taste good. The men-folks came in to the house at noon hour for the big meal: fresh pork, fried potatoes, schviele mouldosh, cucumbers sliced and put into vinegar water; and Mrs. said it's very good with cream. They also served onion in vinegar, custard, or schwartenberren pie, fresh bread and butter, and coffee. Chicken and noodle soup substituted for meat and potato meals on some days. (Foods were salted when needed, but pepper was only placed on table for choice.)

In summer, when eggs were more plentiful, Mrs. Pfannenstiel said she used five or six egg yolks in her buttermilk pancakes. This made them richer and a very stable food for hungry men who worked fourteen or so hours a day. (In winter she would use less, as hens laid fewer, and winter noodles for the same reason might be made with only two egg yolks.) For present-day preparation for breakfast, Mrs.
Pfannenstiel says she still adds five yolks, even to her Gooch’s Pancake Mix!...

The following recipes have been selected from among those in the Fort Hays Kansas State College Folklore Collection because they are undoubtedly of Volga German origin. Recipes in the collection which are probably from Volga German sources but for which documentation is incomplete or lacking, and those from outside the primary settlement area (Ellis, Rush, and Russell counties), have been omitted.
