A COMPARATIVE STUDY OF NOAH:
FOUR PLAYS IN ONE

A Thesis Presented to the Faculty of the Department of English
Kansas State Teachers College, Emporia

In Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree Master of Arts

by James E. Quinn
August, 1967
Thesis
1947 10

Charles E. Walton
Approved for the Major Department

James E. Boyer
Approved for the Graduate Council
TO MY WIFE
PREFACE

Many scholars have found in the origin of the Old Testament plays well-known Biblical stories to which they attributed the Bible as a major source. However, medieval writers have investigated this area in an attempt to interpret fully how such a source might be used throughout the individual cycles. As a result of their endeavors, it is now possible to approach the plays with a more direct and intermediate source, the Roman Breviary, rather than with the Bible itself. Since there is no way in which to date the plays with complete accuracy, chronology as a source is abandoned.

In order validly to compare the plays, the Romano-Breviarium, extant in medieval days, was used. This important repository of Old and New Testament stories was transmitted to the people through the Church. I have therefore adopted, for ready reference, the lectiones and responsoria of this collection contained in the Appendix.

In this study, I have chosen to devote Chapter One primarily to the Breviary as the liturgical origin of the Noah plays. The remaining chapters have as their purpose a thorough investigation of the Noah play in its extant forms as it appears in the Chester, York, Towneley, and Hegge cycles.

This comparative study was undertaken in order to demonstrate the belief that only one anonymous play of Noah exists in a theological sense, but that it may be analyzed in its four independent stages of development in each cycle. My purpose to such an end has been to determine to what extent the changes in the development of the Noah play reflected the individual cycle from which it came; and to suggest in what direction the Church's teachings has made the independent plays liturgically one. One can no longer ignore the role of the Roman Breviary nor its pattern of influence in the evolution of the medieval play.

I wish to express my sincere appreciation to Dr. Charles E. Walton, Chairman of the English Department, Kansas State Teachers College, Emporia, for his patience, his interest, and most helpful guidance at each stage in the preparation of this thesis. Additionally, I wish to express my gratitude to Dr. June J. Morgan, also of Emporia State Teachers College, for her acute and helpful criticism; also to Mrs. Margaret Stutzman, Assistant Professor of Librarianship, Kansas State Teachers College, for her interest and suggestions; and to Reverend Conrad Stark, Sacred Heart Church, Emporia, for his assistance; also to Mr. Steven Schrader, Instructor in English, College of Emporia, for his German translations; and lastly to Reverend Timothy Fry, Saint Benedict’s Abbey, Atchison, Kansas, for his help.

August 26, 1967
Emporia, Kansas
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>CHAPTER</th>
<th>PAGE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>I. THE LITURGICAL ORIGIN OF THE NOAH PLAY</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>II. THE CHESTER NOAH PLAY</td>
<td>27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>III. THE YORK AND TOWNELEY NOAH PLAYS</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IV. THE HUGGE NOAH PLAY</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V. THE INDEPENDENT-UNITY OF THE NOAH PLAYS</td>
<td>107</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BIBLIOGRAPHY</td>
<td>111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APPENDIX</td>
<td>121</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CHAPTER I

THE LITURGICAL ORIGIN OF THE NOAH PLAY

The liturgical influence on medieval religious drama is fundamental to the study of the medieval mind and, consequently serves more than as a source for the existence of art, literature, and life. The basic tenets of Salvation and Redemption, the moral philosophy by which man transcends earthly endeavors, and the infinite union with a Supreme Being are but a few vital beliefs. While the subject is vast and detailed, it is not without boundaries. Liturgy was a way of life on one hand, and a divine answer to the condition of man on the other.

In a general sense, the individual plays were based directly on the liturgy or grew up with it, whichever the case may be, inasmuch as in content and form they show a resemblance.¹ One does not mean to imply, however, that all of the extant medieval plays had a liturgical play as a major source. One theory of source is that the liturgical drama came into its own through pieces of Scriptural accounts, rather than from a direct text of the Gospels. Another theory suggests that the liturgical play was created by the Church to promote its own teachings. One can recognize these theories and others by acknowledging that these plays are deeply-rooted in the Church, that they drew upon its liturgy, and that they combined its elements of piety and common sense in the process. In this manner, the plays served as the word of the Church, particularly since the Bible was not available to the laity. Even so, few could read.

It is known that English Scripture was withheld

2Walter W. Greg, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Cycles, p. 77.

5Karl Young, The Drama of the Medieval Church, I, 75.

6Sidney M. Clarke, The Miracle Play in England, p. 5. see also Joseph Hermana Beckmann and Ingeborg Schroth (eds.), Picture Bible of the Late Middle Ages, p. 4.
from the people on the assumption that, if they read a portion of it, they would, then, want it all in English. Fortunately, other means were available to relate the liturgical material to the people. One major means is the sermon, which interpreted the Holy Scripture in light of daily events and in a manner understandable to the public. Here, the sermons were incorporated into the various pageants as the producers worked closely with the preachers, even using the sermons as part of the general Prologue. These "dramatic sermons" are proof that both the preacher and producer were familiar with most of the Bible. Thus, from a liturgical standpoint, they worked together in teaching the Church's doctrines to the people. Moreover, the influence of the sermon was not confined to the churchyard and the pageants, its influence spread throughout the town. There were many, of course, who did not attend sermons, which conduct prompted sharp criticism, but for most their service was invaluable.\textsuperscript{12} Hence, there is evidence to suggest that the roots of realism had their beginning within the popular sermon.\textsuperscript{13} In fact, one writer has suggested that the legend behind Noah's wife originated in the pulpit in an effort to reach the public.\textsuperscript{14} More important, however, the sermon aided the plays, endowing them with a native influence and a degree of popularity.\textsuperscript{15}

One must consider, at this point, the significance of the Roman Breviary, which is a liturgical source used in the sermons, and one of the most important single influences in the medieval religious drama, for reasons to be made apparent. The word, \textit{breviary} (lat. \textit{breviarium}), in its primary sense refers to an abridgment, or a compendium.\textsuperscript{16} In liturgical parlance, \textit{Breviary} means a large book containing the regulations for the celebration of Mass or the canonical

\textsuperscript{12}Ibid., p. 480 (John Bromyard, prominent Dominican theologian, spoke out against such absenteeism.)

\textsuperscript{13}Hans-Jurgen Diller, "The Craftsmanship of the Wakefield Master," \textit{Anglia}, LXXXIII (1965), 283.

\textsuperscript{14}Mary Desiree Anderson, \textit{Drama and Imagery in English Medieval Churches}, p. 53.

\textsuperscript{15}Owst, op. cit., p. 479.

office throughout the year. The oldest manuscript of the canonical office, compiled in the year 1066, is found in the Monte Cassino, the monastery of St. Benedict. Under Innocent III (1193-1216), the popular use of breviaries spread outside Benedictine jurisdiction, principally through the efforts of the Order of Friars Minor or Franciscans, who were not a strictly monastic order like Benedictines, but an active secular order. The unification and simplification of the services into one book in its typical form took place in England about the eleventh century. This form of the Breviary (Brev. Sine Ordo-Officiorum or Portiforium) was the book "carried" by the priest on "trips abroad," the latter of which represents a smaller and more portable version of the former.

The Roman Breviary, extant in medieval times, is divided into five parts: (1) The Psalter is the most ancient and respected portion, containing 150 psalms,

17 loc. cit.
18 Ibid., p. 773.
19 Ibid., p. 774.
21 loc. cit.
and is the primary source of Christian prayer. (2) The Proper of the Season contains the office of the different seasons of the Church year. It is arranged as follows: Advent, Christmastide, Septuagesima, Lent, Holy Week, Paschal Time, and Time after Pentecost. (3) The Proper of Saints consists of the lessons (lectiones), psalms, antiphons, and the liturgical formulaires, commemorating the saints. (4) The Common contains all the lessons (lectiones), Gospels, antiphons, responsories, and versicles which relate to no special feast. (5) The Special-Offices consists of private prayers, such as hours and lauds.22

The lectiones or lessons of the Matins for the period from Septuagesima Sunday to Passion Sunday cover the greater part of Genesis and Exodus; while the responsory, or the reply to the lessons, contains the stories of the Creation and Fall, Cain and Abel, and Noah and the Flood.23 Within this Lenten Season, the specific division of the Breviary relating to the Noah play is Sexagesima Week, which is the week following Septuagesima, or sixty days before Easter. Thus, the liturgy of the Lenten season forms the basis of the Old Testament plays found within the _lectiones_ and _mysteria_ of the Roman Breviary. Although the Bible antedates the Breviary, liturgy was available and gave to medieval man a source from which, rather than from the Bible in its entire form, were drawn the materials for the religious drama. Consequently, the elements within the liturgical cycle of the early Latin plays, together with their episodic structure, are found in the corresponding seasons of the Breviary. It might be significant to mention that Young examined more than two hundred breviaries from the eleventh to the fifteenth centuries and found little variation. Hence, Craig notes that the Old Testament plays, as a group, are derived from "one principal source, or at least 24 Kardin Craig, _English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages_, p. 65.

---

26 _Ibid._, p. 29. This subject is fully considered later but is now briefly mentioned to preclude erroneous ideas at the outset.

27 Kretzmann, _op. cit._, p. 10.

introduced to conform to a definite pattern." 29

Further, these plays, then, are joined with the Easter series and, eventually, with the Christmas group, to complete the season. 30

One cannot discount the essential role of Church liturgy in the development of the religious services, nor can the Church's liturgy be separated from the subject matter of the Roman Breviary. 31 In this connection, the Scriptural lessons contained in the responses of the Breviary, together with the accompanying lectiones, created detailed elaborations of the traditional stories. 32 It is, therefore, possible to see how from these early Church exercises there evolved the rudimentary elements of drama, including action, effect, and dialogue. 33 For example, the Precentor or Leader recited a passage from within the lectiones, or lessons, and the other monastic members repeated this

29 Hardin Craig, "The Origin of the Old Testament Plays," Modern Philology, X (April, 1913), 481-482.

30 Ibid., p. 485.

31 George Raleigh Coffman, A New Theory Concerning the Origin of the Miracle Play, p. 35.

32 Kretzmann, op. cit., p. 73.

33 Clarke, op. cit., pp. 10-11; R. S. Loomis and
C. Cohen, "Were There Theatres in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries?" Speculum, XX (January, 1945), 92.
Obviously, there were no theatres for purposes of dramatic performances, as Loomis and Cohen attest in full.
passage from Scripture. 34 Further, attempts were made to involve the laity in the dialogue, as these "hours" were extended throughout the parish churches. 35 But since the dialogue of both these services and "plays" was in Latin, the clergy had to devise a method by which these elements would be understood. 36 Although the exact process is unknown, it would seem probable that the early Latin plays were interpreted from the Breviary by the clerics and acted in a manner that promoted the well-known teachings of the Church. Hence, these clerics served the Church until 1539, at which time, Rome prohibited them from acting in the plays, but it was not until 1603 that they were removed from the drama altogether. 37 It should be obvious that additional problems arose as the Church services could no longer be effectively combined with the plays. 38

The transfer of performances from inside the 34 Hebermann, op. cit., p. 772. The text of Sexagesima Week, contained in the Appendix, illustrates how this closely associated service.

35 Hastings, op. cit., p. 771.

36 Clarke, op. cit., p. 5.

37 Ibid., p. 13.

Church to its various localities, affected the form, and necessarily changed the use of language. At least, in the more "advanced" plays, Latin was taken over gradually by vernacular elements. This process may, in part, explain why there are preserved no Latin plays on Abraham and Isaac, Moses and the Exodus, and Noah, which some feel came into existence independently and were incorporated later into the Old Testament group. However, that these major plays were put directly into the vernacular is doubtful, since they still show signs of Latin tags. It may, therefore, be valid to assume that the Latin tags are remnants of a well-known source, probably the Breviary, and indicate the author-cleric's familiarity with such a text. For the most, the vernacular influence had already replaced Latin before the craft guilds came into control of the various plays.

41 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 65.
42 loc. cit.
43 Wickham, op. cit., I, 120.
The manner in which the plays came into guild jurisdiction still remains a mystery. However, even after the plays were in the hands of the guilds, they still remained under strong church control. In fact, after a play was assigned to a guild, generally a monk or priest was commissioned to write it. Thus, while the plays were religious, their production was the responsibility of the civic administrators in control of the performances. The guilds that financed the plays among other duties were usually assigned to a particular play on the basis of their qualifications. For example, in Noah's Flood, the Waterleaders and Drawers of Chester and the Shipwrights, Fysshers and Marynars of York were in charge of producing the play. Relevant to this matter of assignment, is the fact that the freedom with which each guild operated depended 44Kenneth Sisam (ed.), Fourteenth Century Verse and Prose, p. xxv.

45R. J. B. Tiddy, The Mummers Play, p. 95.
46Clarke, op. cit., p. 58.
47Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 10.
48Allardyce Nicoll, British Drama, p. 31.
49Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, pp. 132-133.
entirely on the nature of the individual city. 50

Generally, guilds were financed through their own fees, contributions, gifts, and funds established according to their specific purpose. 51 Religious guilds were also formed throughout the country. For example, at York their sole purpose was to assist in the elaborate Corpus Christi procession, which constituted an act of faith. 52 In general, the guilds of laymen and clergy worked together in promoting activities, ranging from Church work to social projects. 53 In the larger towns, the guilds grew in prominence, for they could employ a large number of members and support a great amount of plays. 54

The favorite seasonal date for the performance of the guild plays was Corpus Christi Day, instituted by Pope Urban IV in 1264, and advanced by Clement V at the Vienne Council in 1311. 55

51 Ibid., p. lxxxvii.

52 Ibid., p. lxxv.

53 Ibid., p. xxxvi.

Corpus Christi Day, the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, began with a spectacular processional through the town, followed with the performance of the plays on a fixed stage.\textsuperscript{56} Guilds in many of these towns participated only in plays associated with the Festival itself.\textsuperscript{57} These latter guilds were not involved with the Corpus Christi plays and were not allowed to interfere with the pageants of the craft guilds.\textsuperscript{58} At Chester, however, where Church processions were popular, the plays were transferred to Whitsun Day, probably to avoid confusion.\textsuperscript{59} Both Corpus Christi and Whitsun were excellent spring seasons for outdoor festivals.\textsuperscript{60} There is no doubt that the religious plays reached their full potentiality during this period.\textsuperscript{61}

It is generally agreed that the plays grew not from the hand of a single author but out of the communal efforts of a number of smaller cyclic plays of

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{56}K. Chambers, \textit{The Medieval Stage}, II, 95.
\item \textsuperscript{57}Karl Young, "An Interlude for a Guild of Corpus Christi," \textit{Modern Language Notes}, XLVIII (1933), 84.
\item \textsuperscript{58}Nestlake, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 57.
\item \textsuperscript{59}Alexander Franklin, \textit{Seven Miracle Plays}, p. 13.
\item \textsuperscript{60}\textit{Loc. cit.}
\item \textsuperscript{61}Chambers, \textit{The Medieval Stage}, II, 103.
\end{itemize}
local popularity.\textsuperscript{52} It is also important to note that the plays were not acted or performed by a group of semi-skilled, ignorant peasants; to be accurate, one would have to say that these plays gave to the religious stage the epitome of what the Middle Ages had to offer.\textsuperscript{63} The paucity of records during the fourteenth century was evidently due to tight Church control of the plays, and not until the productions were handled as a municipal activity were they recorded in the city records.\textsuperscript{64} At any rate, the establishment of such a Feast was another method of bringing the liturgy into direct contact with the life of the people.\textsuperscript{65} It was not until the late fifteenth century that these events lost their popularity.\textsuperscript{66}

Before examining the various approaches to the Noah play as it appears throughout the cycles, it would be appropriate to look closely at the Christian symbolism from which the Noah story was derived for a

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{52}Craig, \textit{English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages}, pp. 9-10.
\item \textsuperscript{63}Ibid. cit.
\item \textsuperscript{64}Hardin Craig, "The Corpus Christi Procession and the Corpus Christi Play," \textit{Journal of English and Germanic Philology}, XIII (October, 1914), 597.
\item \textsuperscript{65}Wickham, \textit{op. cit.}, I, 313.
\item \textsuperscript{66}Westlake, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 58.
\end{itemize}
fuller view of its liturgical significance. For example, the story is deeply embedded in the Divine Office and grew as a significant expression of the religious framework that promoted its purpose.67 This framework includes God's over-all scheme of Salvation, which begins with the Creation and continues to the end of the world and Final Judgment.68 Such a pattern was sacred to the medieval mind and remained, with few exceptions, unaltered throughout the numerous performances.69 Thus, this liturgical pattern embodied well-known themes, including the Redemption of Man.70 One should note that these themes were not present for dramatic but for liturgical practices, symbolically expressing the belief of centuries.71 It would seem a short step, then, to the story of the Building of the Ark, the Flood, and Salvation, each of which was popular 69Richard Southern, The Seven Ages of the Theatre, p. 56.

70Greg, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Cycles, p. 17.

71Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 9.
and acceptable within this natural framework.\textsuperscript{72} If to modern critics these liturgical stories seem anachronistic, it is only because the modern mind fails to realize that behind each play lies the fundamental scope of man's existence evident in a highly unified pattern.\textsuperscript{73} More profound, even, is the fact that the entire circuit of plays is directly controlled by, and gains its unity through, the Church.\textsuperscript{74}

In \textit{The City of God}, Saint Augustine emphasized that these early teachings cannot be studied as history or allegory, \textit{per se}, but that their preservation during thousands of years, in such an "orderly succession" is evidence that one must study history in light of one and then another's end.\textsuperscript{75} However, to allow for a careful study, one must turn to Sexagesima Week itself, since the ancient symbolism relates the meaning behind the Noah story as apparent in Scripture. The following complete text of this pre-Lenten Week is paraphrased from

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{72} Alfred W. Pollard (ed.), \textit{English Miracle Plays, Moralities, and Interludes}, p. 180.
\item \textsuperscript{73} Craig, \textit{English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages}, p. 9.
\item \textsuperscript{74} Mackinnon, \textit{On Cit.}, p. 438.
\item \textsuperscript{75} Whitney J. Oates (ed.), \textit{Basic Writings of Saint-Augustine}, II, 315-316.
\end{itemize}
Dr. Pius Parsch's The Church's Year of Grace: 76

The Week of Sexagesima

In the Parable of the Sower, the Church shows God at work and illustrates man's duty to cooperate. The Sower scatters his seeds upon the ground but it depends upon the ground whether His seed will produce. This central message is illustrated by two men, Noah and Paul, the former from the Old Testament, the latter from the New. 77

Sexagesima Sunday

At first, Noah is pictured as the sower of flesh who represents nature; in the image of the ark and flood are implied the redemption.

Next, Noah, at God's command, is building the ark through many years. Noah's nobility and goodness are emphasized to represent the piety of the human race through virtue. This passage indicates how Christ is the ultimate Sower, both Sower and Seed.

Noah, the Just, is preserved to continue the human race. This preservation is not due to nobility but to divine holiness and piety.

Monday After Sexagesima

This day represents the beginning of the flood. Noah, his family, and animals enter the ark as the flood begins. Water destroys all life on earth and covers the highest mountains. The flood was a punishment from the hand of God for man's sins.

Tuesday After Sexagesima

Then God remembered Noah and his companions. God calmed the waters and the floodgates of heaven were closed. The rains from the heavens ceased. The waters gradually subsided at the end of one hundred and fifty days. On the seventeenth day of the 76 Dr. Pius Parsch, The Church's Year of Grace. II 32-50.

---

77 Note, that only Noe will be taken up here.
seventh month, the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat. On the first day of the tenth month the tops of the mountains could be seen. This scene, indicative of high praise, represents the Savior's resurrection which is inherent in the traditional Alleluia.

Wednesday After Sexagesima

Noah leaves the ark. Then God commands Noah to bring with him his wife, sons, and sons' wives, and all living creatures of all flesh, birds, cattle, and each creature that crawls upon the earth.

Then Noah built an altar to the Lord and sacrificed every clean animal and bird. God was pleased and promised never to destroy human creatures again. God next established his covenant with Noah and all men to follow. A bow was fixed in the clouds as a symbol of God's covenant with the earth.

Thursday After Sexagesima

The sons of Noah who left the ark were Sem, Ham, and Japheth. With them the earth was populated.

Noah, a farmer, planted a vineyard and one day was drunk from the wine. As he lay naked in his tent, Ham, his youngest son, saw his nakedness and told his two brothers outside. Sem and Japheth clothed their father's nakedness. Ham's disrespect toward his father, who had not known the effect of the wine, prompted Noah to predict the destinies of his sons and their offspring. From God Noah received the power for such an act. This lengthy episode shows Sem as the ancestor to the Redeemer, and that it is imperative to remember God during all daily activities.

Friday After Sexagesima

Scripture presents the Table of Nations, from which seventy-two peoples have descended from Noah's three sons. This symbolic table represents that mankind is a member of one family and one creator.

The next event deals with the tower of Babel in which Sem's children appear hostile to God, resulting from the conflict in languages. The idea here is that confusion begets sin but that Christ always brings unity and order to troubled people.

Saturday After Sermeseima

This account takes one through the story from Sem to Share, Abraham's father, and ten succeeding generations.

Obviously, the Church condensed these symbols of Salvation into a working form compatible with the Roman Breviary and Daily Missal for the purpose of instruction.

As has been taught in early Christian theology, and to the present, these signs guide the lives of all Christians. Church doctors agree that the story of Noah involves the following basic doctrine:

1. The deluge shows a divine act which punishes the corrupt children of the world. Sin is washed away by both the deluge and baptism.

2. God sent Noah to save all mankind; later He sends Christ as the Savior.

3. The ark symbolizes the Church. Noah is saved by the ark, as man today is saved by the Church.

4. The dove with the olive branch symbolizes the baptized Christian.

5. The rainbow is the sign of peace and shows the Redeemer's covenant to which heaven and earth are joined.

While it is tempting, here, to discuss the entire significance of the Mass, one brief point is that the ceremony itself was a dramatic event, with antiphonal singing and responses that gradually developed into the traces of the well-known Cuan Guriditis.\textsuperscript{79} In the Daily Missal, the following passage for the Friday in Easter Week, illustrates the unity with which the Noah story is extended throughout the Church's liturgy:

---

78*Parsch, op. cit. p. 44.*

> . . . These in times past had been disobedient when the patience of God waited in the days of Noah while the ark was building. In that ark a few, that is, eight souls were saved through water. Its counterpart, Baptism, now saves you also (not the putting off of the filth of the flesh, but the inquiry of a good conscience after God), through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ our Lord.\textsuperscript{30}

It is apparent, therefore, that the apex of religious drama developed within the services of the Church, first, in the solemnity of the Mass and, later, in the immediate liturgy, the Breviary, available to the people.\textsuperscript{31}

While medieval religious drama has its immediate origin in Christian liturgy, one concedes that its development was due also to external influences.\textsuperscript{32} As citizens in the towns became more prosperous, they were able to purchase a cheap quality of paper on which

\textsuperscript{79}John Gassner (ed.), Medieval and Tudor Drama, p. 33; also Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 4.

\textsuperscript{30}Walter Van de Putte (ed.), Saint Pius X Daily Missal, p. 331.

\textsuperscript{32}John Speirs, English Medieval Poetry, p. 303.
ecclesiastical and secular manuscripts appeared. 33 These materials were circulated throughout the villages and served as a powerful aid in teaching the Scripture to the ordinary man. 34 On the assumption that the eye communicates better to the uninformed than the ear, visual representations in the form of carving and stained glass were also common instruments of instruction. 35 In Church art and manuscripts, representations of Noah are scarce, but those that exist suggest interesting attempts to relate the story to contemporary life. In addition, several works illustrate a clear deviation from the traditional story, while in most of them there are remarkable parallels with the religious plays. For example, the Holkham Bible Picture Book contains the story of Noah, emphasizing the idea of his drunkenness. 36 Another picture in the same text shows Noah with a basket of sheep, strongly suggesting their use on the stage. 37 The Noah legend

33 Beckmann, op. cit., p. 1.
34 Loc. cit.
37 Anderson, op. cit., p. 140.
was found on the wall-paintings of a Swedish church, and another in the Church of Edshult (Smaland), dating from the fourteenth century. These early productions indicate the nature of Noah's wife and her known association with the devil. The Edshult painting, for example, illustrates that the devil is on her shoulder, controlling her hand, while Noah has hold of her other hand, coaxing her into the Ark. There is evidence to suggest that the Edshult work reveals an English influence, especially in the manner of theme and style. This theory is probably sound, inasmuch as the Biblical influence was already continental.

The Villberga Church (Uppland) contains two fifteenth century Noah scenes, one of which shows an angel building the ark; the other, although marred by inept restoration, pictures the devil and Noah's wife, the dove and raven scenes, and Noah, all three of which are combined into a single fresco.

---

89. Ibid., p. 623.
90. Ibid., p. 624.
(Ostergotland), five original paintings illustrate in order: (1) the ark under construction, (2) the devil's conversation with Noah's wife, (3) a potion scene involving the devil and Noah's wife, (4) a scene with Noah in the ark, leaving his wife on land with the devil, and (5) one in which Noah is looking from the window of the ark. In the Caedmonian Manuscript XII, there is evidence of a woman, apparently Noah's wife, waving her hand and refusing to climb a ladder. Although Garvin is cautious on this point, the MS. would seem to suggest that the artist was familiar with the popular wife's legend. It this view is sound, it is vital in proving that the Noah's wife episode was known in England between 1000 and 1035 A. D. It was obvious that medieval craftsmen and writers drew upon their knowledge of the plays to illustrate the Scriptural material. It would also seem, without doubt, that what was shown through the liturgical stage

93 loc. cit.
94 Garvin, op. cit., p. 89.
95 loc. cit.
96 Ibid., p. 90; Sir Israel Gollancz found the same conclusion independently and dates it 1000 A. D. from: Xill, "Noah's Wife Again," Publications of the Modern Language Association, LVI (September, 1941), 614.
97 Anderson, op. cit., p. 15.
was often repeated through paintings. 98

Another external influence was the use of block woodcuts as illustrations. The earliest known illustration of Noah's ark was discovered at Cologne in Werner Rolewinck's Fasciculus Temporum, around 1473-74. 99 Another, Jacobus de Theramo, the designer of Der Sondern Troest, illustrated his text with a full page cut of Noah's ark, on February 15, 1434; and Werner Rolewinck's Fasciculus Temporum used a small illustration of Noah. 100 The Speculum Humanae Salvationis, a compendium of Old and New Testament subjects, was designed to assist the clergy in their teaching. 101

This monumental work, fifty-eight picture blocks in all, included eight scenes from the Old Testament, some of which are the Fall of Lucifer, the Creation, and Noah. 102

Scholars have discovered other sources that directly influenced the religious plays within the four cycles, as well as have promoted the liturgical theme. For example, at least seven plays of the Chester cycle

100: ibid., II, 574.
101: ibid., I, 245.
102: loc. cit.
are influenced by the poem, Stanzaic Life of Christ.\footnote{Robert H. Wilson, "The Stanzaic Life of Christ and the Chester Plays," Studies in Philology, XXVIII (July, 1931), 414; see also Sixagesima Week in this poem, A Stanzaic Life of Christ, edited by Francis A. Foster, pp. 131-133.}
The French, \textit{Nistre du Vien Testament} has similarities to be found within the entire Chester cycle.\footnote{Arnold Williams, \textit{The Drama of Medieval England}, p. 120.}
Additional Chester influences are Conestor's \textit{Historia Scholastica}; the \textit{Lorenda Aurea}; Tatian's \textit{Harmony}; and miscellaneous hymns, legends, and sermons.\footnote{Wells, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 549.} Certain definite works, such as \textit{The Northern Passion} and \textit{Gospel of Nicodemus}, have influenced the Hagge, York, and Towneley cycles.\footnote{Francis A. Foster, "The Mystery Plays and the Northern Passion," \textit{Modern Language Notes}, XXVI (June, 1911), 171.} York's cycle has also felt the effects of the \textit{Cursor Mundi}, \textit{Transitus Meriae}, and \textit{Lorenda Aurea}.\footnote{Wells, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 554.} Additionally, the \textit{Prima Pastorum}, the \textit{Harrowing of Hell}, and the \textit{Cursor Mundi} have influenced the Towneley.\footnote{Ibid., p. 559.} Numerous other references have been suggested as liturgical influences on the

The Newcastle Shipwright's edition of \textit{Nash} has been omitted in this study because of its fragmentary nature; and similarly, the so-called Hull's \textit{Nash} play, acted on Plough Monday, also because only records remain of the lost text.\footnote{Anna J. Mill, "The Hull \textit{Nash} Play," \textit{Modern Language Review}, XXXIII (October, 1938), 489.} All other editions of the play are later than the medieval period and, therefore, are excluded from this review.
CHAPTER II

THE CHESTER NOAH PLAY

As earlier noted, the Vulgate, from which the Breviary account of Noah was adapted, is the ultimate source for the Noah play and provides the account found in Genesis (6: 1-15; 7: 1-24; 8: 1-22; 9: 1-29). From the standpoint of source, this plot will be used for the purpose of examining the extant editions of this play. The story, a familiar one, begins with God's anger over the wickedness of men, in which He promises to destroy all creatures on the face of the earth. But Noah, who is a just and perfect man, found grace before the Lord and, together with his sons, Sem, Cham, and Japheth, walked with the Lord. God instructed Noah to build an ark of timber planks, the length of three hundred cubits, the breadth of fifty cubits, and the height of thirty cubits. In the ark shall be a window, a top in a cubit, and a door on the side. There are to be a lower, middle chamber and a third story within the craft. Then, God told Noah to enter the ark, with his wife, sons, and their wives, and two of every kind of living creature of all flesh, of male and female, and to take food with them. Noah did as God said. He took with him into the ark seven male and seven female of clean beasts, and of the unclean beasts, two of each, a male and female. It rained on the earth forty days and nights, and Noah was six hundred years old when the waters of the flood overflowed the earth, on the seventeenth day in the second month. The water was fifteen cubits higher than the mountains which it covered, and all flesh was destroyed that moved on the earth. And God remembered Noah and all living creatures who were brought in the ark and sent a wind over the earth and abated the waters, after a hundred and fifty days. The ark rested in the seventh month, the seven and twentieth day of the month, on the mountains of Armenia. On the first day of the tenth month, the tops of the mountains appeared. Thereafter, forty days passed, Noah opened the window of the ark, and sent forth a raven, which did not return until the waters were dried on the earth. He sent forth also a dove after him to see if the waters had ceased, but the bird returned, unable to land for the waters were high on the earth. Noah caught the dove and brought it into the ark. After seven days, Noah again sent forth the dove and it came to him in the evening, carrying a bough of an olive tree. Noah understood that the waters were ceased but remained seven days longer before he sent forth the dove which did not return. Thus, on the first day of the first month in the six hundred and first year, the waters lessened on the earth. On the twenty-seventh day of the second month, the earth was dry and God told Noah to leave the ark with his companions. Thereupon, Noah built an altar to God and offered holocausts. God smelled the sweet savour, blessed Noah and his sons, and promised that He would never again destroy the world by water. God then set His bow among the clouds as a covenant, uniting all living creatures of flesh with His heavenly kingdom. God then told Noah to increase, multiply, and fill the earth. Immediately discernible is the manner in which the various plays of Noah adhere to this original plot.

One recognizes that, within the plays, the events and scenes may change, but the basic story remains, for the most part, intact.

An examination of the plot of the Chester play of Noah, III, indicates the degree to which the dramatist expanded the original story, made use of available sources, and reflected the immediate environment. The opening scene follows closely the original source, particularly in the statement of God's purpose. One minor difference is that the height of the ark is fifty cubits (28), rather than the Biblical thirty; however, no appreciable deviation occurs until Noah enters. Here, the dramatist depicts Noah as a man who is humble and sincere, willing to alert his family to the duties for which they have been selected. Almost at once, Noah engages his entire family in building the ark, a scene of great activity and one that depicts Noah as a skillful motivator. The entire household is noticeably busy, as Sem gets his axe, Ham bears his

---

112. Herman Deimling (ed.), The Chester Plays, p. 43. All citations to the Chester play will be taken from this edition.

hatchet, and Japhet his hammer.\textsuperscript{114} Noah's wife contributes her part by finding timber, while Sam's wife brings a chopping block; Japhet's wife provides some chips, and Ham's wife gathers pitch.\textsuperscript{115}

The next division of the play depicts Noah's building of the ark (61-95), which is completed with medieval rapidity; this scene is followed by Noah's short conversation with his wife who is reluctant to see the importance of the whole operation. Next, God orders Noah to bring his household aboard, along with clean beasts of seven, male and female, two unclean, male and female, and enough food for all. God, then, promises that the rain will fall for forty days and nights. Noah tells the audience that he has been building the ship for one-hundred and twenty winters, a fact which differs from the source, but, as one critic suggests, Noah's task is slight compared with the difficulty to come in getting his wife aboard.\textsuperscript{116} The entire family help to bring the animals inside; one after another each member, including Noah's wife, describes a group of animals. One notes, again, that each person has an

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{115}\textit{Ibid.}, p. 107.
\textsuperscript{116}\textit{Loc. cit.} \end{flushright}
active part, assigned a quatrain each, undoubtedly a descriptive-devise for including the characters in the dialogue.

The next scene shows Noah's commanding his wife to board the ark so that she will not drown, but she refuses to enter without her "gossips":

But I have my gossips everi'chon, one foote further I will not goe;
they shall not drowne, by St. John,
and I may save their lyfe.
(201-204)

Finally, it is left to Noah's sons to lift their mother into the ark, the action in which is a considerable departure from the scriptural source. At this point, the "gossips" entice Noah and the others to drink, inasmuch as the flood is coming, a gesture which is a mild allusion to comedy. Then, Noah welcomes his wife in the ark, whereupon she slaps him (242). While it is possible to imagine that the audience found such an event quite amusing, it is equally probable, for reasons to be dealt with later, that the humor is kept subordinate throughout. Noah praises God for their safety; the window of the ark is closed, as the flood

117 Ibid., p. 109.
118 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 185.
approaches. One notes that the window in this scene is probably opened after the flood.120

After forty days, a raven is dispatched to see if the land is dry, and it is followed by a dove that returns with the olive branch (273). God, then, commands Noah to leave the ship and to return to earth where he is to grow and multiply. Thus, for the remaining seventy-five lines, including Noah's sacrifice and God's promise of a covenant, there is a consistent parallel between the play and its source.

As this account might suggest, the author has wisely used sources available to him for the purpose of developing particular scenes within the story. In this fashion, he has allowed the characters to grow out of the dramatic situation and, of course, far to surpass their Biblical counterparts. For example, Noah's responsibilities to his family become far more complex as a result of his problems with his recalcitrant wife. While there is a constant obedience on the part of the children, there are also the "gossips" who are ready to act against Noah's instructions. In addition to being a dependable servant of God (41-48), Noah is a man of feeling, capable of expounding on the subjects of the irritable nature of women (104-112), or the spiritual union with God (297-304). It would seem that the author consciously strove to effect an atmosphere of domestic harmony within which his characters might be developed. But the basic plot, for the most, remains untouched.

120Clarke, on c. 21., p. 37.

Chester play III, presented by the Waterleaders and Drawers, must be examined in view of the times in which it was performed.121 In the first place, Chester was a prosperous and independent city with an atmosphere that is reflected in its plays.122 At least, by 1467 there were around eight guilds that were actively producing plays.123 Between 1467-1540, this number grew, and the cycle included close to twenty-six plays.124 Acting time for these productions involved three days, which feat obviously required some physical ability.125 For no apparent reason, many plays were divided and altered several times, and the contents varied from one time to the next, depending on the 121Frederick M. Salter, Medieval Drama in Chester, p. 41.

122Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, pp. 194-195.
123Salter, Medieval Drama in Chester, p. 46.
124Ibid., p. 48.
125Franklin, op. cit., p. 15.
company in charge. 126 Two sets of banns appear from Chester, advertising the plays on St. George's Day. 127 One observer dates the earlier banns as being around 1551. 128 Chambers suggests, 1544, while Salter mentions an earlier date, 1467. 129 These earlier banns were versified in the same stanzaic form as the plays. 130 The point is, these banns contain valuable information about the plays and important facts about the crafts in charge of production. In the following account of Noah's play, the earlier banns indicate the craft in charge:

The Company or trades that play:

Drawers in Dee & Waterleaders

The Story or matter that every Company did acte:

Noah & his ship

These records do not mention the flood account, for reasons unknown, although the later banns, of the seventeenth century, list the play with the following 126 Craig, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Plays, p. 23.

127 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 157.
128 Halls, op. cit., p. 549.
130 Chambers, The Medieval Stage, II, 140-141.
entry:

The good simple waterleddors and Drawers of Decey, see that your Arke in all payntes be prepared of Roy and his Children the whill storie and of the universall flove by you shalbe played.132

One notes that this record includes most of the scenes of the play and, perhaps, suggests an even more complete performance.133

Apparently, the Noah play entered the Chester cycle before 1467.134 However, in spite of the fact that guilds were prevalent, actually there is some doubt as to whether the play came into craft control at this time; for crafts were not strong in Chester, at least until the reign of Henry VIII.135 It was likely that the play was given during the regular Whitsun season and remained close to the Church until 1531.136 Records indicate that one of the popular translators, Randal Higden, had to make at least three trips to Rome

---

133 The "Breviary of Chester," compiled by Archdeacon Robert Rogers and son, David Rogers, is an additional source and a valuable record. Salter W. Greg (ed.), The Trial and Flescellation with Other Studies in the Chester Plays, p. 121.

135 Salter, Medieval Drama in Chester, p. 42.

136 Ibid., p. 43.
for permission to render the original Latin plays into English. 137 In this connection, both Higden and, more recently, a monk, Henry Francis (1377-39), have been suggested as authors of this cycle. However, the Church's influence created the spiritual foundation of the cycle and should always be recognized as such. Even beyond 1538, Church officials attended the plays at St. Werburagh's. 138 Even more interesting are the records that reveal the cooperative spirit between the Church and the community which the following record of purchase indicates: "Sould to Thomas Sheuyntons sonne the belman & tho dychers sonne 3 course vestments & a course streamer to make players garments." 139 However, the enthusiasm between the Church and crafts weakened over the right of censorship regarding the religious stage in 1530. 140 The mere fact that there were sufficient clergy in residence at Chester would suggest that a dramatist probably was not allowed much theatrical license. At least, the Chester manuscript tends to reveal such evidence. It is apparent that the

---

137 E. Hamilton Moore, English Miracle Plays and Morality Plays, p. 43.
139 ibid., p. 18.
140 Wickham, op. cit., II, 55-56.
people of Chester were a devout group and that those who were clerics took an active part both in the drama and in city affairs. Moreover, even after laymen replaced clergy as actors, the Chester plays evinced a high degree of religious respect. 141

The matter of Noah's wife merits some discussion.
In the earlier scenes of Chester, one does not bother greatly about her remarks that women are weak and that it is a man's place to carry timber (65-68). Rather, it is after refusing to enter the ark that she gains
the most attention (197-200), as her troublesome nature clearly comes before the audience. Her actions, thereafter, identify her. Here, she appears drawn between Noah's command, which is God's, and her good
"gossips," who probably represent the sinners or devils of the world. While no devil actually appears, Mill suggests that the reference, "Come in, wife, in 20 devills ways, / or els stand there without" (219-220), rather than idiomatic, might be the so-called "devil-naming device" (the association of a character with the devil for numerous reasons.) 142 One is inclined to believe that this scene of high pitch, in which

141 I. C. Eton King, The Chester Miracle Play,
 p. xii.

142 Hill, "Noah's Wife Again," Publications of the Modern Language Association, LVI (September, 1941), 625.
Noah's wife causes the trouble, is more serious and didactic than it is comic. In the first place, after her family fails to sympathize with her and her chances of joining the "gossips" are almost gone, she still exhibits a stubborn determination to remain where she is. A stock character she may be, but also one that is true to what she believes. One critic suggests that it was unwise of Noah, at least in his first request, to command that his wife go into the ark. At any rate, the scenes between Noah and his wife represent the author's use of domestic realism and show that he obviously knew the habits and ways of the common folk. It seems almost as if the author knew exactly how far to extend the fighting scene in order to create an exact impression upon his audience. The Gossips' Song (225-232), usually reprinted in the footnotes of the text, appears in a different meter from the rest of the play and, for this reason, is usually assigned to a later date. In this connection, there has been no evidence found on the origin of the music which might suggest the date in which the "comic revisions".

---

143 Williams, op. cit., p. 121.
144 Arthur Brown, "Folklore Elements in the Medieval Drama," Folklore, LXIII (June, 1952), 75.
145 Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 27.
occurred.146

The entire episode surrounding Noah's wife frequently has been investigated with the purpose of determining whether her nature is comic, serious, farcical, or exactly when her influence began and for what purpose. To this end, there have been traces of her history found in the apocryphal Jewish accounts, particularly in Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, where she appears only as being angry.147 In Weil's Biblische Legenden der Muzelmannen, she is the messenger who warns of the flood.148 She also makes a brief appearance in Ginsberg's Legends of the Jews.149 One critic feels that her legend is of English descent, at least as it evolved from the old Cornish plays, evidently in an attempt to evoke realism.150 Certainly, Garvin's dating of the incident cannot be discounted in this connection. Another writer sees her as one of the 147 Willicent Carey. The Wakefield Group in the Norseley Cycle, pp. 76-77.

148 loc. cit.

149 loc. cit., There is a footnote on the mocking relatives who appear in the northern poem Cursor Mundi, II., 1729-44; see also Anderson, op. cit., p. 7 on the Cursor Mundi and this point.

150 Abid., p. 77.
"scoffers" in the Koran. In addition, there is a clue between the tenth century use of the "devil-naming device," which was first given to an ass and, later, directed to the behavior of Noah's wife. In Enikel's Malachronik, a late thirteenth century work from Vienna, there is an illustration of Noah's wife anticipating Noah's behavior before he uses the "devil-naming device." At least, one can be confident that the legend surrounding Noah's wife was not necessarily a product of the religious plays, although her story was incorporated into the Chester, York, and Twayneley cycles, and, probably, into a great many other plays. At best, one must look to the art, the folklore, and the entire background of the episode in considering this popular "comic" entry. A final view is that of Woolf, who posits that in all the plays but the Ludus Coventriae, Noah's wife represents the character of Eve, as she objects to Noah's every move. Although the idea, here, cannot be any more than a theory, it would appear that, if she were intended to be comic, it would have been revealed as it developed through a series of definitely marked stages.

---

To be sure, the element of humor had its place in the medieval plays, but probably as an attempt to retain a more realistic effect, and was, consequently, not as obtrusive to the medieval audience as it might appear to be, today. 156 It is conceivable that the exposer, at the end of Chester's play, dealt with Noah's wife in terms of the meaning of anger and disobedience, rather than in terms of outright humor. There is no doubt that the episode had for its purpose a lesson. 157 To this end, the conservative Chester society permitted "comic" elements in its plays. 158 One must admit, however, that any method of approaching this puzzling character has its disadvantages.

As to stage properties, the play has Latin directions, indicative not only of the pen of a clerical writer, but one who shows skill in the use of stage machinery. At the beginning of the play, there is the lengthy direction: "It primo in aliquo suprenso loco

156Salter, Medieval Drama in Chester, p. 87.
157Clarke, op. cit., p. 34.
give in nubibus, si fieri poterit, loquatur deus ad Noe extra Archem existentem cum tota familia sua."159 As the direction suggests, in order to illustrate mountains, clouds, and other effects, the dramatist had at hand a variety of stage materials such as winches, hoists, and lifts to assist him.160 However, Thompson challenges this opinion, suggesting that the stages were without any such devices, except bare essentials.161 At any rate, the above direction indicates, of course, that the ark is already constructed. Thus, the next direction shows that the action in the building-scene is one of pantomime: "Tunc faciunt signa, quasi laborarent cum diversis Instrumentis."162 This direction is repeated fourteen lines later, probably in its action to remind the audience of the construction so that they may further identify themselves with the actions in the episode. One could imagine that God's presence above was enhanced considerably through the use of 159 At first in some high place, or in the clouds if it may be, God speaketh unto Noe standing without the ark with all his family.

160 Williams, op. cit., p. 106.

161 Albert M. S. Thompson, "The Ludus Coventriae," Modern Language Notes, XXI (1906), 20.

162 Then they make signs, as if laboring with divers tools.
stage machinery. Collins suggests that, in most cases, God is accompanied by angelic music, which, also, would be an aid in creating the atmosphere.163

The third major direction is interesting:

Rumi noe introibit archem, et familia sua debit e societate omnia animalia de pictis in cortis et, postquam unusquisque suam locutus est partem, ibit in archem, quare noe excepta, et animalia depicta cum verbo concordare debent, et sic insipier primus filius.164

As the passage suggests, the border of the ark, on which the pictures were painted, illustrates more than fifty different animals described within the play (161-192). One can imagine the sons and wives pointing to the pictures on the ark as they describe each animal.

However, in the nave of Norwich Cathedral, two scenes show that real animals may have been used; for example, one shows a man carrying two sheep, and the other, a woman with a basket in which may be seen several birds.165 The Malvern windows depict Noah with a goat and alongside him several kinds of animals.166 The Chester

164 Then noe shall go into the ark with all his family, his wife except and the ark must be borded round about and on the border all the beasts and fowls received must be painted that the words might agree with the pictures.

165 Anderson, op. cit., p. 140.

166 loc. cit.
Novelty play often used animals, and, one thinks it is highly probable that they were used sometimes in the Noah play, in spite of stage directions to the contrary. Sympathy was frequently shown toward animals as a result of St. Francis. However, any specific influence is difficult to trace, here. There are two directions involving the scene with Noah's wife—punc tit (then he shall go) and et set alarumult (and she gives him a lively blow)—both of which are probably used to advance the tension of the story. Time is traditionally eclipsed during the play, as the audience is reminded by the direction: "Tunc Noe claudet fenestram Arohae et per medium spatium infra tectum cantent psalmum 'save mee o God' et aperien fenestram et respiciens." This direction introduces one of the few religious songs in medieval drama as the "gossips" sing a hymn, i.e., "Save me, O God, for the waters are come in unto my soul!" (King James, No. 69). The use of such music might be explained by the fact that Chester was a musical 168 Then Noe shall close the window of the ark, and for a short while within, let them sing the psalm "Save me o God," and opening the window and looking around, Noe said:

Nativity play often used animals, and, one thinks it is highly probable that they were used sometimes in the Norch play, in spite of stage directions to the contrary.
Sympathy was frequently shown toward animals as a result of St. Francis.\textsuperscript{167} However, any specific influence is difficult to trace, here. There are two directions involving the scene with Noah's wife—\textit{tunc ibid} (then he shall go) and \textit{et lat claramvita} (and she gives him a lively blow)—both of which are probably used to advance the tension of the story. Time is traditionally eclipsed during the play, as the audience is reminded by the direction: "\textit{Tunc Noe claudet fenestram} Arcae et per modicum spatium infra tectum cantent psalmum
'save mee o God' et aperiens fenestram et respiciens."\textsuperscript{168}
This direction introduces one of the few religious songs in medieval drama as the "gossips" sing a hymn, \textit{i. e.},
"Save me, O God, for the waters are come in unto my soul!" (King James, No. 69).\textsuperscript{169} The use of such music might be explained by the fact that Chester was a musical \textsuperscript{167}Woolf, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 619.

\textsuperscript{168}Then Noe shall close the window of the ark, and for a short while within, let them sing the psalm
'Save me o God,' and opening the window and looking around, Noe said:

\textsuperscript{169}Collins, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 619.
city and had one of the earliest known minstrel associations in England. One of the most fascinating directions, however, involves the process of releasing and returning the dove to Noah: "Tunc emittet columbam et eit in nave alia columba ferens olivam in ore, quam dimittet ex malo per funem in manus Noe, et Postea dicat Noe." One would suspect that a pulley and a rope mechanism were used to effect this movement. One writer suggests that Noah probably drew the dove down with his hands from a string attached to the mast. There was a tradition which holds that most any effect could be produced in Chester, if the budget saw fit. The final stage direction shows Noah and his family leaving the ark: "Tunc egrediens arcanum omnia familia sua accipiet animalia sua et volucres et offeret ea et mactabit." Then, like the original source, the

170 Ibid., p. 617.

171 Then shall he let loose a dove and there shall be in the ship another dove bearing an olive in her mouth, which someone shall let down by a string into the hands of Noe.

172 J. Q. Adams (ed.), Chief Pre-Shakespearean Drama, p. 171; see also, Martial Rose (ed.), The Wakefield Mystery Plays, p. 163.

173 Williams, op. cit., p. 106.

174 The going out of the ark with all his family he shall take his animals and birds, and shall offer them and make sacrifice.
animals and birds are offered to God in thanksgiving and, thus, the play's circuit is completed by the covenant, as the play ends with the final "Finis paginæ Tertiae," (end of play three).

A closer look at the Chester play reveals the direct connection between the liturgy of the Sexagesima Week as it appears in the Roman Breviary and the point at which the dramatist invented elements for purposes of the dramatic situation. The sequence of events in the play and the parallel passages in the Breviary may suggest a method useful in evaluating other plays whose subjects are in accordance with the Church year:

Noah

Deus. Manna that I made I will destroy, / beast, yme, and foule to flie; / for on earte they doe me / thar forth, ... that sore it greeveth me inwardlie / that ever I made manne.

(9-16)

God continues to speak to Noah:

Therefore, Noe, my servant free, that righteous man art as I see, a shipp none thou shalt make / thee of trees drye and lighte. Little chambers therein thou make and

Breviary

God. I will destroy man whom I have created, from the face of the earth, from man even to beasts, from the creeping thing even to the fouls of the air, for it repenteth me that I have made them.

(Sun., II.)

175To determine on what day in the Week the passage occurs, with its parallel Latin, I refer the reader to the Appendix.
Another aspect is the similarity of lines within the play and its immediate source. For example, the phrase "Noe is free, righteous man (servant)," appears in three sections of the play (17-18; 115; 370); and the words, "Noe is just and perfect . . . walks with God," appear three times in the Breviary.176 Furthermore, these passages occur almost in the same positions of the texts in both the play and Breviary, twice at the beginning and once at the end, although such textual evidence is not always reliable. God, again, commands Noah to take into the ark the following:

Noah

Noe, take thou thy means ye, and in the shippe lye that you be;// for none so righteous man to me is now on earth lyving, of cleane beasts with thee thou take / seaven and seaven, or thou shalke, // hee and shee, make to make to lyve in that thou bringe, of beasts uncleane two and two, male and female, without me; of cleane foules seaven also, the hee and shee together.

Breviary

So in thou and all thy house into the ark; for thee I have seen just before men in this generation. Of all clean beasts take seven and seven, the male and the female. Of the fowles also of the air seven and seven, the male and the female.

(113-124)

176 See Appendix: (Sun., ii, B; Sun., iii; and Thurs., ii, B.)
Since there was a tendency to expand the legends found in the Breviary, it is altogether possible that these accounts of the stories suggested to the dramatist the original concept of Biblical expansion. One notes, also, that those sections in which God is narrator are usually closest to the source and, thus, indicate no deviation. Again, in the raven-scene the textual parallel is obvious:

Noah

Now 40 days are fullie gone. send a raven I will send if ought-where earth, tree, or stone / be drye in any place. (257-260)

Breviary

And after that forty days were passed, Noah, opening the window of the ark which he had made, sent forth a raven: which went forth and did not return, till the waters were dried up upon the earth. (Tuss., ii.)

God, who is now pleased with Noah's work, increases the bond between them. One doubts that the playwright could have tampered with these words in the presence of such a clerical atmosphere as Chester:

Noah

You shall now grow and multiply, and earth again e you drinke; each beast and foule that may flie, / shall be arrayed of you. And fishe in sea that may flytte shall susteyne you, & you behite, to eate of that you no leste, that cleane bone you may knowe.

Breviary

Increase and multiply, and fill the earth. And let the fear and dread of you be upon all the beasts of the earth, and upon all the fowles of the air, and all that move upon the earth: all the fisches of the sea are delivered and everything shall be meat for you: Saving that flesh with blood you shall not before grass and roots, sith you were born / of cleanse beastes now, les and more, / I gave you leave to eate, / Safe bloody and flesh bothe in feare or wrong dead carren that is here, / eates not of that in no manere; for that eye you shall let.
 Manslaughter also you shall die; / for that is not pleasent to me. that shades bloode, he or shee, ought-where amongst mankinde.

(321-336)

Even more interesting is the Parable of the Sower and Seed (344-352) in which the writer utilizes Church symbolism to introduce the covenant scene, thus, uniting the play to its liturgical cycle. In a sense, then, the audience is morally bound to the play, as the play is bound to its own liturgical pattern. Hence, a unity of purpose and a deep sense of logic are evident, not only in the play, but in the cycle. 177 Nothing can better express this dramatic union than the following parallels of God's words to Noah:

Noah
My Sowe betwene you and me in the firmament shall see, by verye token that you may see that such vengeance shall cease,
That man he woman shall

Brevity
This is the sign of the Covenant which I give between me and you, and to every living soul that is with you, for perpetual generations. I will set

177Salter, Medieval Drama in Chester, p. 105.
never more / be wasted by never more / never more / be wasted by Tater re is before, / but Tater re is before, / but for syn that groweth me
for syn that groweth me sore, therefore this sore, therefore this vengeance was.
vengeance was.

Where clouds in the wilkin
Where clouds in the wilkin
bene, / that ilkè hove
bene, / that ilkè hove
shall be seen / In tokeninge
shall be seen / In tokeninge that my wrath and tone shall
that my wrath and tone shall never this woken be. This never this woken be. This swinge is turned toward swinge is turned toward you / and toward me is bent
you / and toward me is bent
the hove that such wedder
the hove that such wedder shall never shawe, / and
shall never shawe, / and this behett I thee.
this behett I thee.

(335-363)

The fact that God maintains a position of high respect
The fact that God maintains a position of high respect and authority contributes to the liturgical purpose and
and authority contributes to the liturgical purpose and supports the didactic elements within the play. The two support the didactic elements within the play. The two major additions to the narrative occur in character
major additions to the narrative occur in character expansion and in the use of communal effort. Obviously, expansion and in the use of communal effort. Obviously,
these additions were directed to a religious community
these additions were directed to a religious community
as reflected in the play and author. From the standpoint
as reflected in the play and author. From the standpoint of source, the Chester play remains close to the Church
of source, the Chester play remains close to the Church
liturgy, probably because of its highly clerical
liturgy, probably because of its highly clerical
atmosphere. Yet, one fully appreciates the author’s atmosphere. Yet, one fully appreciates the author’s attempts at characterization and those of domestic attempts at characterization and those of domestic appeal. Although it is unlikely that any one play will appeal. Although it is unlikely that any one play will serve conclusively in identifying an author, one suggests serve conclusively in identifying an author, one suggests that the Chester author had a developing part in that the Chester author had a developing part in achieving a dramatic appeal and more than once demon-
achieving a dramatic appeal and more than once demonstrated his acquaintance with the medieval conventions regarding the Church and stage. It appears, therefore, that this conservative play is a valuable record of the time.

CHAPTER III

THE YORK AND TOWNELEY NOAH PLAYS

The York play includes two separate pageants, one performed by the Shipwrites and concerned with the Building of the Ark; and the other related to the Story of the Flood, presented by the Fyschers and Marynars. It would seem that the unusual feature of this cycle is the appearance of a play which occurs only as an incident in the other plays of Noah. One notes, also, that this feature of two pageants evidently arose out of vast methods of production. But the fact is, the internal evidence indicates that Play VIII, on the building of the ark, is the earlier one, containing an older stanza and one that is notably more serious. On the other hand, Play IX, of the flood, exhibits a later stanza and a considerable deviation from the Biblical source. Play VIII is shorter, contains only God and Noah as

---

178Clarke, op. cit., p. 80.
179Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 8.
180Gayley, op. cit., p. 151.
181Ibid., p. 152.
characters, and adheres closely to the original account of this incident. It is highly probable that this latter play was a part of the older cycle, given over in toto to the later play IX, the opening directions to which suggest such a possibility: "The Ark in the forest where it was built." It might be well to mention, here, that the York cycle experienced revisions, too numerous to mention, and that these pageants probably measure the diversity of development attained within the cycle. 182 Greg's criterion of play lengths—early ones very short and later very long—would seem to bear out such an hypothesis. 183 Whoever was in charge of these pageants undoubtedly saw the great need for retaining the earlier pageant, which was probably due to guild participation or the demands of changing conditions. 184 One notes, furthermore, that York had the necessary wealth and an abundance of trading facilities to promote a number of extra pageants. 185 The fact that the pageants suggest a desire to divide

182Baugh, op. cit., p. 279.
183Greg, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Plays, p. 25.
185Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Age, pp. 7-8.
the clerical and secular matters (God appears only in the Shipwrits' version) is an interesting topic, but one lacking substantial proof.

Play VIII, containing 151 lines, retains the traditional ship-building scene as found in the source, except for two deviations.\(^{186}\) For example, Noah tells God (49-52) that he is too old to construct a ship and cannot work except out of necessity; he, then, continues to explain (65-68) that he knows nothing about the manner of shipcraft. Whether or not Noah, here, represents the playwright's position is a matter that cannot be proved beyond conjecture. At any rate, God explains in detail the process (69-88) and Noah, an apt apprentice, soon relates the details to the audience.\(^{187}\) Rose contends that the craft was undoubtedly assembled on the stage but that a prefabricated model could not have been used by one person in the time allotted.\(^{188}\) The evidence, to date, seems to indicate that some construction was made, but evidently the ark was already built into the shape of a boat or house, with an open front so that the audience could observe the action.

\(^{186}\) Lucy Toulmin Smith (ed.), York Plays, p. 40. All references to the York play of Noah are from this edition.

\(^{187}\) Williams, op. cit., 127.

\(^{188}\) Rose, op. cit., p. 161.
inside. As to the length of performance, the forty-eight play cycle was given in a single day, beginning at 4:30 a. m. Logic would suggest that within such a short acting time, a permanent ark would be necessary.

The author of the York play, IX, shows a vast divergency from the Biblical narrative, as he attempts to shape the play to fit his needs. The dramatic personae gives eight characters, even without God, while the play is skillfully divided into three scenes. For example, the first scene opens with a forty-six line monologue in which Noah grieves the coming of the flood because of sin, and recalls that his father, Lamech, also had predicted such an event. Here, Noah tells the audience:

Syr's, by pis wele witte may ye,
My ffaidir knewe both more and myrne,
By sarteyne signes he couthe wele see,
That al pis worlde shuld synke for synne.

(33-36)

With these remarks, Noah stresses the importance of punishment and is depicted as a spokesman for God. Next, he orders his son to fulfill his commands, one of which is to call his mother into the ark (47-54). The author characterizes the son as being most obedient, for he departs immediately for Noah's home. The second scene, which is short, shows the son asking his mother to join Noah in the ark (55-70). In reply, she refuses to believe him, but after three attempts, he finally coaxes her into following him. Thus, early in this play, Noah's wife is a dubious and stubborn woman. Scene three and the rest of the play are given over to depicting Noah's wife as a reluctant spouse, the events of which become highly dramatic. Refusing to enter the ark, she offers three reasons for her behavior. In the first, she states that she must return home in order to pack her personal items; in the second, she accuses Noah of not telling her about his plans to build an ark; and in the third, as in the Chester, she must have her "gossips" and cousins first. The fact that all three reasons appear to be practical ones suggests that she is within her rights to comment upon her "secretive husband." It should be remembered that Noah was in the forest building the ark for one-hundred years. It would, therefore, be reasonable to assume that she felt upset and neglected. At any rate, her daughters comfort her, as she finally consents to Noah's demands. In spite of the comic interpretation, this scene effectively presents a pathetic but serious account of the so-called shrew. Furthermore, the author's additions to his source provide insight into the family's relationship, while the incident with Noah's wife serves as a kind of bond between the audience and the characters in that one may identify himself with her at any time. The dramatist concludes the play on a series of minor scenes which follow his source, as Noah tells the family to go forth and multiply. Thus, Noah has remained as the exemplar of the faith; he is not necessarily affected by other characters, except God, but other characters are affected by him. Furthermore, one realizes that Noah's wife and children serve as a means of accentuating the plot, enabling Noah to function in his familiar role.

---

189Clarke, op. cit., p. 71.

190Franklin, op. cit., p. 15; also, Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 28.

193Creizenach, Geschichte des neuren Dramas, I, 209.
194Loc. cit.

In addition to several short stage directions (74, 96, 120, 200, 216, and 246), there are two instances in which the author makes use of a narrator (211-218 and 281-288), perhaps to advance the story and to serve as a break between Noah's lengthy speeches. The reliance upon familiar nautical language, i.e., "... I sall caste leede and loke be space" (199), to measure the depth of the water indicates the writer's familiarity with such terms and reveals, perhaps, an influence of the Shipwrights and Mariners. Probably, the similarity of Noah's words, "Bot nowe my cares aren keen as knyffe" (7) to the son's, "Oure cares are keen as knyffe" (223), indicates the common idiom of the writer.

Another deviation from the source is Noah's promise that the world is to be destroyed by fire (301). This allusion, Smith says, might originate from Iranian legends. Of further importance, is the part that Noah's children play as they support the narrative. Scholars have pointed out that they illustrate the author's adroit skill in versification. Besides aiding their mother, in three sections (178, 251, and 296), they also remind the audience of the time that has elapsed. Furthermore, one is reminded of the 196 Williams suggests that the absence of lengthy stage directions in this play may mean that the director's contributions were never put into writing. For some reason it was not necessary in York. Williams, op. cit., p. 101.

---

197 Clarke, op. cit., p. 20.

198 Smith, op. cit., p. xlvii.

199 Ibid., p. xlvi.
familiar dramatic chorus in their manner:

Pat lorde pat lennes vs lyffe,
To lere his lawes in lende,
He mayd bothe man and wyffe,
He helpe to stynte oure striffe.

(219-222)

As earlier noted, York, a wealthy city, financed a host of pageants. One could only imagine the amount of activity when Richard II attended the plays in 1397.200 There were, during this time, at least sixteen stations throughout the town and apparently a great deal of competition entered into in order to have these stations visit one’s home.201 A strong city council regulated the performances, maintaining order, imposing fees, and handling most of the details with the plays.202 Each guild, in turn, owned its own play and, outside of council control, conducted the performance according to its own manner.203 Even before city guilds, there developed in 1408 religious guilds founded by the clergy, undoubtedly an attempt to heighten the moral

200Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 205.
203Greg, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Cycle, p. 27.
aspects of guild-life. At least seventy-five clergy were among the first members, and during the years, the number grew to over seven thousand, many of whom left costly legacies in which the city benefited. Throughout York, there was a consistent moral outlook, particularly to be seen in the close supervision of these plays. The reason for this attitude, of course, is not hard to find. York was an ecclesiastical centre and undoubtedly possessed one of the most religious cycles. However, the plays are not as "religious" as those of Chester and are probably of a later vintage, as indicated in the so-called Memorandum Book of 1376. Roger Burton, a town clerk, compiled two sets of records around 1415 and 1420, which confirm the popular forty-eight play count. In any case, their total pageants and income far surpassed those of

204 Westlake, op. cit., p. 53.
205 Ibid., pp. 54-55.
206 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 147.
207 loc. cit.
208 Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 28.
Chester. 210 As a rule, the expense for producing a play fell to the crafts. 211 They, in turn, received sufficient contributions, in addition to their own fund, in which to allocate expenditures. 212 One further note concerns the existence of sixteen stations in York which made the procession a lengthy one. 213 However, this method of performing the plays throughout the city is unquestionably a result of Corpus Christi influences. 214 The original manner in which the guilds assembled the plays cannot be traced with any complete accuracy. About all that one can do is to observe the religious and civic points of view and the individual craftsman who encompass the entire cycle of production. 215

The York dramatist does not hesitate to show both sides of life. In this sense, he might be considered an early forerunner of accurate and scientific thought. 216 Scholars have longed to know more about this York

210 Loc. cit.
212 Ibid., p. 116.
213 Ibid., p. 139.
214 Oswley (ed.), Everyman and Medieval Miracle Plays, p. xii.
215 Kenneth Sisam, op. cit., p. xxv.
216 Brown, op. cit., p. 76.
Realist whose influence was one of exceptional ability, one who blended the contemporary scene with the art of Gothic realism. 217 Craig, for instance, believes the York Realist was a deeply religious person. 218 Others suggest that he was primarily a reviser, specifically of eight Passion Plays in the cycle. 219 Rossiter, acting on the assumption that the entire cycle underwent a revision, claimed that the Realist revised only certain parts of it. 220 As to composition dates, Frampton feels that the author did most of the work during the early part of the fifteenth century. 221 Others suggest that the cycle had three periods of revision and that the middle period, of Noah, is separate from the later more realistic period. 222 While there have been numerous attempts to discern when

218 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 158.

220 Arthur Percival Rossiter, English Drama from Early Times to the Elizabethans, p. 66.

222 Gayley, op. cit., p. 158.
and where the York Realist revised parts of the manuscript, there is, at least, significant agreement that the plays show an independent aspect of development. In other words, the plays are the individual products of York from which they came. Equally important, is the realistic quality which permeates these plays, executed within the strict confines of religion, as portrayed in Biblical events. It would appear, then, that the religious appeal united the medieval audience in a respect for truth, one that intimately involved the entire cycle in a kind of "shared devotional experience." To be sure, the plays were directed to a normal mode of living that one might encounter during the fourteenth century, and, consequently, in them appear familiar and not uncommon events. Both pageants of the York cycle show the liturgical influence. One need only set aside the domestic episodes, as in the Chester, to see the

---

223 Greg, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Cycles, p. 27; Schlauch, on cit., p. 319; Smith, on cit., p. xliii.

224 Mackinnon, on cit., p. 437.

225 Wickham, on cit., I, 260.

significance of these passages. For example, Play VIII echoes the passages in the breviary from Sonagensima Week, as God tells of the destruction of the world:

Noah
Deus. If nowe I will his world be wrought, / And waste away bot wonny perin, / A floyd a-bowe bane shall be bright, / To stroye medilethe, both more and myn. Bot Noe alon lef shall it noght. To all be sowkyn for ther synne.

Brevisary
God. It is repenteth him that he made man on the earth. And being touched inwardly with sorrow of heart, He said: I will destroy man, whom I have created, from the face of the earth. But Noe found grace before the Lord.

(25-30) (Sun., ii)

These opening remarks suggest the theme throughout both pageants; next, God tells Noah in what manner the ship is to be constructed:

Deus. Take high trees and have bame cleyne, / All be aware and night of skryn. iiiii cubittis it shall be long, / And fitty brode, all for thy bys, Pe highte of therty cubittis strong.

Brevisary
God. Make thee an ark of timber planks. . . . and thus shalt thou make it: the length of the ark shall be three-hundred cubits: the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits.

(73-74; 81-84) (Sun., iii)

At this point, the author expanded his original source to allow for a detailed account of how the ship's materials were bound together. The fact that the precise dimensions are retained shows a close familiarity with the source, or, at least, a certain scribal accuracy. The remaining parallel in Play VIII suggests the amount and types of items that are to accompany the ark:

227 Kretzmann, op. cit., p. 35.

Noah

Deus. For dyuers beestis ter-in must leade, / And feules also in pere degree.

God. Of all clean beasts take seven and seven, the male and the female, Of the fowls also of the air seven and seven, the male and the female.

In that selfsame day Noe, and his sons, his wife, and the vines of his sons... destroy all the land, but only Noe and all with him in the ark shall remain.

In play IX, Noah alludes briefly to Lamech, his father (15) in the opening scene. The Lamech account appears in the Breviary during Septuagesima Week, but does not concern this play directly. Furthermore, there are no direct source parallels again until line (211), probably because of the realistic encounter between Noah and his wife. At this juncture, the Raven and Dove scenes pick up the source narrative, as it were, with the following explanation:

Noah

The Raven is wise, and wyse is hee. / Pou arte ful crabbed and al thy kynde, / Wende forth the pi course I commaunde be... My birde had done as I hym bade, an olyue braunch I

Breviary

Noe, opening the window of the ark which he had made, sent forth a raven: Which went forth and did not return till the waters were dried up upon the earth... sent forth the se hym brynge. Blyste be pou feule pat neuere was fayd. (212-215; 255-257) cove out of the ark. And she came to him in the evening, carrying a bough of an olive tree, with green leaves, in her mouth. (Tues. ii; iii)

Even more interesting, Play IX includes two Latin cues that are also found in the Breviary, and their close agreement with the source, again, suggests the liturgical framework of the play:

Noah

... For synne as men may see, Dux dixit penitet me. Full sore for-thynkyng was he That euere he made mankynde. (277-280)

Breviary

... It is repented him that he made man on the earth. And being touched inwardly with sorrow of heart... for it repenteth me that I have made them. (and the Latin) doenitet enim me fecisse sos. (Sun., ii)

Three lines later, the second Latin phrase occurs:

But sonnes he saide, I watte wele when, / Arcum ponam in rubibus, / He settle his bowe clerly to kenne, / As a to-kenyng by-twene hym and vs In knavlage tille all cristen men, / That fro bis worlde were fynyd bus, / With wattir wolde he neuere wastyd pen. (282-283)

God. This is the sign of the Covenant which I give between me and you, and to every living soul that is with you, for perpetual generations. I will set my bow in the clouds, (Arcum meum ponam in rubibus) and it shall be the sign of a Covenant between me, and between the earth... and there shall no more be waters of a flood to destroy all flesh. (Thurs., i)

Kretzmann suggests the phrase, Ponam arcum meum in rubibus coeli, in response to the Latin tag found on Indeed, it is surprising, for his quotation does not appear as often in the source, while the more accurate Arcum meum ponam in h观音ibus appears at least seven times throughout the Week. At the end, a symbolic use of the seed imagery appears to unite the play even further to its source:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Noah</th>
<th>Breviary</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Noe. Sones, with youre wiffes 3e sall be stedde, / And multipart yeoure seede sall be. (311-312)</td>
<td>God blessed Noe and his sons, and said to them. Increase and multiply and fill the earth. X. Behold I will establish my Covenant with you, and with your seed after you. (Wed., i)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Equally important, the audience is reminded of a further liturgical concept, as Noah discusses the elements of "brede & wyne" (318), found also in the Breviary (Thurs., ii). The play ends with the traditional, "In goddis blossynge & myne." (322). It is evident, therefore, that the dramatist had a keen knowledge of scriptural material. Most likely, he was a member of a religious house, somewhere in the vicinity of North Yorkshire.229

Towneley Play III immediately presents a problem as to whether or not Wakefield was the locality for the

---

228 Loc. cit.

229Smith, op. cit., p. xlvi.
plays. Mention is made of the name "Wakefield" only in connection with plays I and III, as part of the titles, and not as later additions.²³⁰ In the first place, if the entire cycle produced the plays in this town, it seems unusual that the name of the community does not appear on all extant editions. Wann suggests that such an omission would seem to indicate that the other plays were not done in Wakefield.²³¹ Tradition holds that the manuscript, belonging to the Towneley family, became associated with "Widkirk" or "Woodkirk," an area four miles north of Wakefield.²³² It is not clear how or when the Towneley family acquired these plays, however Towneley Hall was close by and may have been connected with the composition.²³³ Another contributing factor is that the village of Woodkirk sponsored events large enough to engage plays.²³⁴ This ²³¹Ibid., p. 152.

²³²Chambers, The Medieval Stage, II, 415. Chambers notes there was only a cell, not an abbey, of Augustinian canons of St. Oswald at Nostel.

²³³Wann, op cit., p. 151; also, Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 34.

concept is further supported by Peacock, who adds that there is no "Widkirk" but that "fairs" were given at Woodkirk, or West Ardsley, about the same location from Wakefield, and that religious events were present.

"Widkirk," possibly taken to mean "Widkirk," is eight miles northeast of Wakefield, but did not have a religious house and, therefore, could not be connected with the cyclic plays. On the other hand, there are no records that indicate Wakefield, at least early, had a Corpus Christi tradition. For that matter, no actual plays have been found. Craig thinks the Burgess Court records from 1554-1556 indicate that Corpus Christi plays were performed on movable stages. While it is probable that the trade guilds produced plays, nevertheless, the size and condition of the streets do not support the idea of movable pageants. However, the fact that Wakefield was a popular center,

236 Ibid., p. 514.
237 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 209.
239 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 209.
240 Peacock, op. cit., p. 518.
and larger than Woodkirk, would support the contention that the plays were given there, as well as in the latter town.\textsuperscript{241} Here, the problem remains.

The first seventy-two lines of the document are devoted to Noah's speech, which recalls that mankind has sinned and that God shall take vengeance upon such deeds.\textsuperscript{242} This speech differs from its source, first, in that Noah appears before God enters. In his opening remarks, therefore, Noah seems to prepare the audience for God's directions. Next, God, Who is above, refers to the destruction of the world and states that all men will perish through the flood. At this point, God comes over to Noah (according to a stage direction) and, in forty-four lines, describes how to construct the ark and explains what to include in it. God's speech is sharp and clear as He commands Noah to follow His explicit instructions. Instead of greeting God, Noah fails to recognize Him and asks for His identification (163-165). When God tells him, Noah is stunned to think that God should appear to such a common man as he. It is quite probable that Noah's behavior, here, reflects that of the author's deep religious respect, although this point cannot be taken beyond conjecture. Further, with this deviation from the source, the dramatist seems to add to the serious scene a human element in which the audience may identify itself with Noah. As God leaves, Noah, who is probably kneeling, is blessed. In the next scene, Noah explains to the audience that his wife has little control over her temper. One notes that this preparatory remark either indicates that Noah is to introduce the major characters in the play, or that such an explanation was deemed necessary in view of the audience.

\textsuperscript{241}\textit{Ibid.}, p. 520.

\textsuperscript{242}Alfred W. Pollard and George England (eds.), \textit{op. cit.}, p. 23. All citations to this play will be taken from this edition.

One next encounters Noah's wife who is upset because it appears that Noah has been wasting his time and neglecting to provide food for the family (190-198). Before Noah can mention the flood or his encounter in the earlier scene with God, she upbraids him further and addresses the audience on the subject of all such husbands (208-216). The tension mounts as a verbal quarrel carries into an exchange of blows, followed by Noah's soliloquy on wives (230-234). At this juncture, Noah leaves in order to build the ark, and his wife returns to her spinning. By this means, the dramatist has used an early domestic quarrel to set the pattern for the later more violent ones that occur over the ark.
One notes, however, that this particular first quarrel did not concern the ark, nor is Noah's wife totally unjustified in her remarks. Next, the scene is directed to the ark, wherein Noah, in forty-four lines, engages the audience in construction. The first stanza gives the measurements exactly as God had earlier commanded (122-126; 257-261); in the second, Noah removes his gown and works in his coat at the mast, complaining occasionally of a back pain; in the third, he prepares the top and sail as he drives in the nails; in the last, he adds the door, window, and three chambers. The Master's ability to dramatize is cleverly shown, here. Rather than telling the audience that Noah is tired, he allows the character to grow, by degrees, weary of his task.243 Thereupon, Noah is tired from his work, but proudly departs in search of his family. One cannot help thinking that a greater part of this construction took place before the audience. At least, it is conceivable that, in this play, prefabricated sections might have been used and merely erected on stage.244 At home, Noah tells his wife, for the first time, about the impending flood (303-306) for which she displays a surprising sense of fear and wonder. Undoubtedly, it would not only be appropriate for the playwright to use a contemporary appeal to carpentry but it would also have been advantageous to the narrative. In this same scene, Noah's wife respectfully aids the family in carrying their goods aboard, but, at the same time, she refuses to join them on grounds that she has more spinning to do. She strengthens her argument by telling the wives that her spinning cannot be done in the ark but upon the hill where she stands (363-366). Although spinning was a common medieval custom, it became associated with superstition and commanded a degree of respect as an element of the unknown. While proof is obviously uncertain, one critic suggests that there was a relationship between her spinning and the coming of the Flood. The fighting scene continues, at the end of which both Noah and his wife direct speeches to the audience. Each speaking on behalf of their position as man and wife, together they provide a clever contrast in character delineation. The fact that the audience is asked to share the problems indicates a degree of the author's ingenuity. Their actions involve the children, who next reproach them for such fighting, and together they enter the ark (414-417).

243Piller, op. cit., p. 275.

244Rose, op. cit., p. 161.

While at the helm, Noah calls upon God to guide his craft as the waters rise. When the flood is at its height, in order to measure its depth, Noah gives the helm to his wife, while he checks the water. His first sounding with the lead is in vain, for he cannot find the bottom.248 The second testing (448), accomplished after forty days, shows that the water has receded; and, on the third, three-hundred and fifty days later, he touches ground on the "hillys of Armony," which event ends the voyage. The fact that on three separate occasions Noah tests for depth suggests either the guild (if there were such) or the author was familiar with the methods of navigation.

In the last scene, having dispatched the raven, Noah dispatches two doves, prays for their safe journey, and blesses one upon its return with an olive branch (508-510). Thus, Noah and his wife, along with the children, leave the ark. Unlike the source, Noah in the last scene asks his wife which bird would be best, an action which seems to indicate an end to family strife, and the dramatist, having removed all serious doubts, has now prepared the way for the "chosen" family.

Noah's behavior is rather modern as he leaves the ark. Rather than prayers, he resorts to ordinary remarks as he observes the destruction of the world. At the end, he asks God to bless his family so that together they may find everlasting happiness with Him in heaven. The audience must have observed Noah as a man who had the fortitude to live according to the moral order. The nature of his relationship to God is held by the author to be proof of a deeper and inborn sensitivity to the needs of his fellowmen and family.

The Towneley playwright has broadened the source to include a considerable variety of realistic material, including domestic violence, social customs, and a much more detailed description of the events of the play. For example, the quarrel of the pair takes on a physical violence in which the setting of the fight is more elaborate, more sequential, and one that eventually involves the entire family. The ship-scene furnishes a useful device in which Noah, with measuring rod in hand, takes the audience through the process of construction, thus, rendering the incident more applicable to their everyday lives. In this connection, Noah uses both the tiller and the oar in attempting to touch the bottom (420), since this particular mechanism was in use and the only one of its kind that reached far enough.249

It is probable that the dramatist knew carpentry, as well as carpenters.250 More important, however, he shows a devout spirit as he sets about the task of making the ship.251 Equally important, he wants to share his satisfaction with his task as he shows the singular effort before the audience. (279). Further, the monologues in this play (208, 230, 389, 397) are not only direct, personal, and concrete, but indicative of the cumulative effect of polished rhetoric. One is not surprised to find that the dramatist was only casually interested in using realism as a device on the stage; his inherent purpose was to create a contemporary identification within which his Biblical and apocryphal events could function.252

249 Ibid., p. 389.
250 Brown, op. cit., p. 75.
251 Nicoll, op. cit., p. 35.
For the most part, the Wakefield Master is the author with whom the Towneley plays have been associated. Such a contention, however, does not mean that one may identify beyond doubt this person with the plays. It is proper to remember that they were anonymous for sound medieval reasons.\textsuperscript{253} As a composer or reviser of the plays, this learned man, of Northern descent, strove to achieve a kind of literary freedom through his use of vernacular language and popular subjects.\textsuperscript{254}

 Apparently, as a result of his efforts in language, critics are able to see in his style a peasant influence, and together with his use of Latin and French, assert that he probably was a secular priest.\textsuperscript{255} The Latin tags and religious inferences throughout the plays also bear out such testimony.\textsuperscript{256} His use of the familiar nine-line stanza and the advanced "bob" mark a distinctive feature that is unrelated to the so-called York Realist.\textsuperscript{257} In this connection, it is possible to

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{253}Craig, \textit{English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages}, pp. 9-10.
  \item \textsuperscript{254}Margaret Trusler, "The Language of the Wakefield Playwright," \textit{Studies in Philology}, XXXIII (January, 1936), 39.
  \item \textsuperscript{255}\textit{Loc. cit.}
  \item \textsuperscript{256}\textit{Robby, op. cit.}, p. 102.
  \item \textsuperscript{257}Chambers, \textit{English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages}, p. 37; see also A. W. Ward, "The Origins associate the Nea gwn Millis, or Play III, with such a poetic system and one of the later period. Recently, it was found that the Master had a hand in the Towneley's Talents play, as well as in a great many other later productions. At any rate, his power to project a sense of reverence and realism into the language gave to his drama a plain and earthy quality, a mode for dramatizing sacred subjects. Nevertheless, his effort is an illustration of what can be done even without modern dramatic techniques, and serves as a valuable source to the contemporary scene.

There is one allusion to costume and two Latin stage directions in the play. Noah's wife says... "Take the ther' a langett / to tye vp thi hose!" (224-225). The word, langett, refers to the "tongue of a balance," (ND) and was first used in 1413. Frampton places the allusion during the fifteenth century and emphasizes that it is a clue in dating the author.

---

260 Frampton, "Date of the Flourishing of the
On the basis of costume, Chambers suggests a date not later than 1426 for the Master.261 Perhaps, it should be said that, since scenery was scarce, these plays made the most of costumes, oftentimes an essential element in the drama of this period.262 One Latin direction, Tunc perget ad uxorem (Then he shall cross over to his wife, 189), serves as a device for descriptive action; and another, Explicit processus Noe, secuitur Abraham, at the end, suggests the fact that the play was probably processional. As the name would imply, processus is synonymous with pagina, meaning pageant.263 Inasmuch as processus appears at both ends of Play III, one safely suggests that it belonged to a movable pageant.

Additional colloquial idioms are worth noting. For example, Noah's wife wishes her husband clad in "Stafford blew" (200), which probably means beaten black and blue.264 "Stafford blew" could also mean a color of attire that depicts one as a "flunkey."

261Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 40.

Noah yells "ravn-skyt" (217) as he tells his wife to hold her tongue; while, on a different occasion, his wife tells the audience that she must have a "measce of wedows coyll" (339), probably to invoke their sympathy concerning the fact that she is not properly fed. The author uses such phrases as "Beytter of bayll (Healer of sorrow, 311) and "all-weldand" (494), both of which indicate late originality and seem to appear only in Wakefield.

In addition to the above, there are three oaths, one on Mary (209), Peter (367), and God (227) which the author has seen fit to include. It ought to be apparent that the dramatist distinguished this play, as well as the cycle, in using those items closely resembling the times.

A closer look at Wakefield shows that in 1381 the population was around 315, and Frampton thinks it unlikely that this town, a farming community, could support a cycle of plays.

Rossiter adds to this

265Gayley, op. cit., p. 169.

view that the town did not come into the wool industry until late in the cycle, and therefore raises doubt, especially as to the home of the earlier plays. As suggested earlier, there is reason to believe that the nearby people must have joined forces in performing these plays and that the size of the town did not matter a great deal. Judging from the play, and the adjoining evidence, Wakefield was probably a scene of great festivity.

There is little doubt that, since York was only forty miles away from Wakefield, there must have been some mutual influence. In the first place, high taxes in York sent many of those in the wool business out of town, probably to nearby Wakefield. However, visits to other towns were not uncommon before and after 1593. Precisely how much borrowing of plays took place, when and in what manner, of course, has been a topic of considerable research. In the case of these two villages, Cady suggests that the Towneley plays

LIII (March, 1935), 17.

268 Rossiter, op. cit., p. 67.
269 Peacock, op. cit., p. 523.
270 Baugh, op. cit., p. 280.
271 Wickham, op. cit., II, 113.
were derived from the York cycle, and that both had a liturgical origin. Another critic, Lyle, on the basis of internal evidence, claimed that both cycles were originally one. This opinion has been challenged by Frank, who suggests that it is far better to talk about individual plays being borrowed, rather than entire cycles which tend to elude an accurate evaluation. Clark, who agrees with Frank, further points out that the plays were probably revised by independent guilds and did not necessarily originate from a "parent cycle." However, another interesting theory, in support of Lyle, is that Wakefield borrowed from the parent-cycle at York, and in the case of Noye, condensed the two pageants into one, since Wakefield was a smaller 272 Frank W. Cady, "The Liturgical Basis of the Towneley Mysteries," Publications of the Modern Language Association, XXIV (September, 1909), 434.

273 Marie C. Lyle, "The Original Identity of the York and Towneley Cycles--A Rejoinder," Publications of the Modern Language Association, XLIV (March, 1929), 318.

274 Grace Frank, "On the Relation between the York and Towneley Plays," Publications of the Modern Language Association, XLIV (March, 1929), 316.

275 Eleanor Grace Clark, "The York Plays and the Gospel of Nicodemus," Publications of the Modern Language Association, XLIII (March, 1928), 160; Grace Frank,
"Revisions in the English Mystery Plays," Modern Philosophy, XV (January, 1913), 188.
town with fever crafts. Craig suggests that evidently the entire York cycle was borrowed and established at Wakefield but, most likely, with the consent of the York City Authorities. Nevertheless, it is now generally agreed that the plays, The Shrovetide, The Doctors, The Marrying of Hell, The Resurrection, and The Judgement, were borrowed from the York cycle. Finally, Chambers felt that the two cycles could not have developed side by side, nor could there be contemporary revisions, since the Wakefield cycle was not fully developed until almost a half century later than York's. Without doubt, the full extent of the borrowing will probably never be known. Thus, one must again consider the basic distinction, which is that two separate towns produced plays which must be evaluated as such.

One, next, must look at Play III as it appears in Sexagesima Week. However, it is necessary for one to recall the divergent ways in which this play, while following its biblical source, varied, because of its immediate influences. In a liturgical sense, the play has for its theme the creation, destruction, and salvation of mankind. This simple pattern, present in the services of this pre-Lenten season, unifies the play, and serves as a means of examining the document. The first seventy-two lines of Noah's monologue concern the creation and fall of man, including an account of the seven deadly sins (51-53). Next, Noah, complaining that he is growing old, invokes God's mercy as an aid (60-63). Speirs thinks that this action indicates that Noah is undergoing both a physical and moral decline. It more than likely says that all men, even Noah, need God's strength to perform all tasks. At least, one would think that the medieval audience would see in it their own human condition. While the Latin tags are noticeably absent, the structure, however, conforms to the liturgy, as in the following:

---

277 Craig, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages, p. 214.

278 Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 35.

Noah

Deus. In erth hymself to God. The end of all flesh stuf with syn that dis-is some before me: the 231Cady, op. cit., p. 463.

233Loc. cit.
please me / Most of all; Vengeance will I take, In earth for syn sake, My frame thus will I make,
both of grete and small.
(85-90)

Deus. I repente full sore that ever made man, / Si ne he settis no store and I am his soveran; / I will dissoy theer for Both beast, man, and woman, / all shall perish les and more that bargain may they / ben, That ill has done.
(91-95)

God. . . It is repented him that he made man on earth. And being touched inwardly with sorrow of heart, He said: I will destroy man, whom I have created, from the face of the earth, from men even to beasts, from the creeping things even to the fools of the air, for it repenteth me that I have made them.
(Sun., ii)

After God cites the dimensions, he tells Noah to
"emynt" (127) the ship, which remark clearly reflects the traditional cleansing of the soul in preparation for its salvation and refers to the Church's baptismal ceremony.284 At this point, Noah is to take his family into the ark:

Noah

When all is done thus right thi wife, that is the make, Take in to the;
/ This same of good same, / Sen, Ephat, and Came, / Take in also hame, Ther wifis also thre.
(139-144)

Braviary

In that selfsame day Noe, and his sons, his wife and the wives of his sons went into the ark-And the Lord shut the door.
(Sun., iii, N.)

284Cowley, The Wakefield Pageants in the Cowley Cycle, p. xxvii.
Next, God warns of the flood and instructs Noah to take with him the following animals:

It shall begin full sone to reyn vncyssentle, / After dayes seven be done
and in dysyn dayes fownty, / with sotton sayll. / Take to this ship also / of ich lynd beestic two, / sayll & femayll, bot no mo, / Or hou pull vp thi sayll.
(147-153)

Indeed, the author makes it clear that this work is to be done "In the name of the holy gast" (162), which is the third person of the Trinity, strictly theological in origin, and a proper function of the Church. Noah conceives of this divine structure as primarily a mystery of faith, as God tells him, "I am god most myghty, / One god in trynyty" (168-169). The appellation, trinity, appears five times in the play (2,30,83, 169, and 254) and is one of the most significant Church doctrines. Strictly speaking, one cannot over-estimate the role of theology in the moral formation of medieval man. Certainly, the basic discipline was, more or less, dictated by the Church, but it was left to the Wakefield dramatist to integrate this material into the totality of the play.285 Furthermore,

285 Eleanor Prosser, Drama and Religion in the
it was not unusual for the Pope, at times, to grant an indulgence for attendance at such performances. 286

God, then, blesses Noah, who is probably on his knees, with these words:

Noah
Noe, to the end to thi fry
My blisseynge grant I;
Ye shal wax and multiply,
And fill the earth again.
(177-130)

Prologue
God blessed Noe and his sons and said to them.
Increase and multiply and fill the earth.
(Sun., vii, x.)

Hunson advances the theory that Play III of the Towneley Cycle is a so-called Discovery Play, in which Noah and his family achieve self-knowledge about the world and others, mainly through their own actions. 287 In such a scheme, however, there is some question about its relationship to religious obedience. 288 In other words, it is difficult to determine at what point the author allows the characters to function on their own, separate from God's influence.

There are several instances in Noah's activities showing that the vocabulary is strictly theological. For example, before building the ark, he blesses

---

286 Cardiner, op. cit., p. 2.
288 loc. cit.
himself, saying, "In nomine patris, & filii, / Et spiritus sancti, Amen," (232). This act, used at the beginning and end of the Roman Mass, involves the invocation of the Trinity to guide one's way, or, in Noah's case, to bless his work on the ark. 289 Indeed, there is reason to believe that such a popular Latin phrase was used colloquially; although it must be remembered that Noah's craft is a special one, designed to withstand all of mankind's sins and, therefore divinely directed. 290

At least six times, the word, faith, is referred to; three times the word charity; as well as the devill (299) and hell (545) within the play. In passing, one ought to observe that the play clearly reflects its own times but also goes well beyond its setting to include the whole treatment of Salvation.

289 See also Tuesday, iii., N., in Appendix.
290 Speirs, English Medieval Poetry, p. 322.
CHAPTER IV

THE HEGGE NOAH PLAY

It is necessary at the outset to acknowledge a problem concerning the background and development of Play IV of the Hegge cycle. During the seventeenth century, the manuscript of Ludus Coventriae was somehow associated with the plays at Coventry, which theory has since been disproved on the basis of textual evidence. The difficulty seems to stem from the early records when Sir Robert Hegge, an Oxford man who died in 1629, owned the earliest known manuscript of the plays. From Hegge, the document was taken over by Richard James, librarian to Sir Robert Cotton, the former having written on the manuscript the words, "Ludus Coventriae sive Ludus Corporis Christi," at the time, the note suggested that the plays were acted by the monks or friars. Dugdale's History of

---

292 Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 47.
293 loc. cit.
294 Moore, op. cit., p. 41.
Warrickshire, which attributed the plays to a local house of friars, probably influenced Hegge and others in associating the plays with the Grey Friars of Coventry. Chambers believes this idea is derived from the Coventry's Annales which attests that Henry VII saw plays performed by the "Gray Friars." Nevertheless, there is sufficient evidence to show that the extant manuscript of Ludus Coventria has no possible connection with the two surviving plays of Coventry. In fact, Greg believes that the Ludus Coventria, while still the work of an East Anglian writer, in dialect alone could not resemble the Coventry plays; so, also, Creizenach.

Craig has suggested that the Annales entry of the phrase, "Grey Friars," may be common idiom to mean the Church and that the craft guilds performed the plays on

295 Chambers, The Medieval Stage, II, 419.
296 Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 47.
297 Chambers, The Medieval Stage, II, 420; these two survive: Sherman and Sailor's Play and The Weaver's Play. Ibid., 423; see also Harbage, op. cit., p. 12.
298 Greg, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Cycles, p. 110.
Corpus Christi, probably on the steps of the "Grey Friars Church." In the conclusion to the general Prologue of the plays, one finds:

A Sunday next, ye that we may,
At ye of the bell we ginne our play,
In W. town, wherefore we pray
That God now be your spee.

Sharp says that, if "W. town" refers to Coventry, the plays did not remain there, for there is no record of performances. Chambers adds to the controversy that "W" probably stands for the word Woman, used in the context of the marriage ceremony, and that the "W. town" refers to either Norwich or Northampton. Rossiter claims that "W" is a typical abbreviation used in the "Sams" to announce the production. Hemingway believes this last part of the Prologue suggests the use of strolling players as needed for the

301 Thomas Sharp, A Dissertation on the Parentes or Dramatic Mysteries Anciently Performed at Coventry, p. 7.

302 loc. cit.

303 Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 47.

304 Rossiter, op. cit., p. 165.
various performances. Obviously, one cannot be secure in concentrating solely upon the popular Prologue alone.

Craig argues that the cycle at Lincoln is the setting for the plays. In the first place, there is evidence from city records which points to a Corpus Christi play being transferred to St. Anne's Day, showing, among other things, characteristics similar to the Hegge cycle. Next, the fact that the Hegge plays had a strong Marian emphasis was a well-known observation. Thus, it was a short step in linking this fact with the significance of the Virgin Mary during the St. Anne's Day ceremonies, another important sign of the home as Lincoln. In his comparison, Craig indicates that Lincoln had a procession on St. Anne's Day, while the Prologue to the Hegge cycle reveals that its older plays were in a processional 306 Craig, "Note on the Home of the Ludus Coventriae," Studies in Language and Literature, Series No. 1 (October, 1914), 75; also Herbert Hartman, "The Home of the Ludus Coventriae," Modern Language Notes, XLI (December, 1926), 530, who agrees with Craig.

307 Ibid., p. 78.

But from the evidence of the plays in Lincoln Cathedral and the extant Hegge stage directions, it is clear that the plays were performed on a fixed stage. Such facts tend to support Creizenach's date of 1517 for the end of St. Anne's Day processions. While it is difficult to determine how many plays used pageants, Craig suggests that, in Play IV, one is employed as Noah comes and goes with the ark. Swenson, who agrees with this idea, mentions further that the ark was undoubtedly on wheels and moved in and out after the Lamech scene. As to the cost, Lincoln accounts reveal that a great deal more was charged for the Noah pageant than for the other plays. However, since the city of Lincoln is on a hill, the typography might not be very desirable for pageant performances.

---

311 loc. cit.
312 Creizenach, Geschichte des neuen Dramas, III, 419.
315 ibid., p. 161.
316 Williams, ibid., p. 100.
At any rate, these few examples, and a great deal more, tend to support the Lincoln hypothesis which seems quite plausible.\textsuperscript{317}

The plot of Play IV is a rapid, two hundred and fifty-three lines, of which the first twenty-five show Noah asking God to protect his family from sin.\textsuperscript{318} Following this prayer-like account, Noah, probably addressing the audience, suggests that each man is subject to evil and that mankind will be held accountable for their deeds. This early speech follows the Biblical source and seems to stress the idea of penance within man's life on earth. The next scene begins a series of monologues in which each member of the family, after introducing himself, proceeds to elaborate on Noah's general recommendations. It would appear that the playwright uses each character to advance the story.\textsuperscript{319} These devices of the play are closely \textsuperscript{317}For purposes of this chapter, Lincoln will be used as the home of the Ludus Coventriae or Hegge Cycle. Dr. Craig treats this whole problem definitively, and in a letter to the author on July, 17, 1967, again verified the Lincoln theory.

\textsuperscript{318}K. S. Block (ed.), \textit{Ludus Coventriae; or the pike called Corpus Christi}, p. 75. All citations to the play are taken from this source.

\textsuperscript{319}Thomas Blake Clark, "A Theory Concerning the Identity and History of the Ludus Coventriae Cycle of Mystery Plays," \textit{Philological Quarterly}, XII (April, 1933), 150. related to the action and take on the form of a rapid-moving dialogue in which few extra words appear. 320
While the characters seem almost lifeless and prosaic, nevertheless one notes that the author shows great invention in manipulating their various speeches. 321
These early speeches seem to be a preparation for God's visit. 322 At this point, he enters (92) and in stern words explains to the audience that He will send an angel to Noah with the message to build a ship. Unlike the God in the other plays, He does not appear directly to Noah but sends His angel as a messenger. 323 This "chain of command" would seem to indicate a formal reliance on the Church's hierarchy, or more than likely, the modern tradition that God cannot be seen by mortal man. God makes only one appearance in the play, speaking twenty-eight lines to the audience. From this point, the angel appears to Noah with God's directions for building the ark. In these directions, there is a noticeable absence of source dimensions for the ark, implying that the dramatist felt that they were

320 Ibid., p. 161.
322 Thomas Blake Clark, op. cit., p. 160.
323 Ibid., p. 159.
unnecessary, inasmuch as actual construction, perhaps, did not take place before the audience. Noah's first reply to the angel is that he is too old (five hundred years) to undertake such an operation, but the angel assures him that God will give him the needed strength. Thus, Noah and his family leave to carry out God's command.

One next encounters the character of Lameth, who during the hundred-year interval involving Noah's obedience, kills Cain, creating an episode about which a great deal has been said. Some maintain that this interlude was added simply to enable Noah and his family to construct the ark. Others suggest that, since there is no mention of the Lameth-scene in the Prologue, it must have been a late addition. If so, the fact that this popular incident might show an allegorical purpose would seem tenable. In a closer look, Swenson points out that the Lameth-scene, including the rest of the play, is in a double-quatrain form, with a "tumbling meter," which suggests a late revision,

324 Rose, op. cit., p. 162.
325 Greg, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Cycles, p. 123.
326 Schlauch, op. cit., p. 7.
also, probably to fit a stationary performance.\textsuperscript{327} Several writers support this latter theory.\textsuperscript{328} As to the major scene change, there is the possibility that the dramatist saw in the ship episode an irrelevant custom, one that wasted time and contributed little to the narrative. It may be this simple, since there were no crafts connected with the play, and the work had to be done elsewhere, although such a theory is not trustworthy, nor consistent with Craig's setting.

After the fifty-five line Lameth scene, Noah enters with his family and tells the audience that the ship is completed (204-213). Clark claims that nothing is said about Lameth, Cain, or any of the details surrounding the interlude while Noah was absent.\textsuperscript{329} However, Sem's wife mentions the murder briefly (224), while both Sem and Japhet discuss the topic of "lechery" at some length (218, 235). One notes, furthermore, that Noah's wife is a patient and devout companion. She enters the ark with no incident.\textsuperscript{330} Obviously,

\textsuperscript{327}Swenson, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 7.

\textsuperscript{328}Block, \textit{op. cit.}, p. xxvi; also, Howard R. Patch, "The Ludus Coventriae and the Digby Massacre," \textit{Publications of the Modern Language Association}, XXXV (July, 1920), 338. See also meter in this latter work.

\textsuperscript{329}Thomas Blake Clark, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 160.

\textsuperscript{330}Bates, \textit{op. cit.}, p. 121.
also, probably to fit a stationary performance.\textsuperscript{327} Several writers support this latter theory.\textsuperscript{328} As to the major scene change, there is the possibility that the dramatist saw in the ship episode an irrelevant custom, one that wasted time and contributed little to the narrative. It may be this simple, since there were no crafts connected with the play, and the work had to be done elsewhere, although such a theory is not trustworthy, nor consistent with Craig's setting.

After the fifty-five line Lameth scene, Noah enters with his family and tells the audience that the ship is completed (204-213). Clark claims that nothing is said about Lameth, Cain, or any of the details surrounding the interlude while Noah was absent.\textsuperscript{329} However, Sem's wife mentions the murder briefly (224), while both Sem and Japhet discuss the topic of "lechory" at some length (218, 235). One notes, furthermore, that Noah's wife is a patient and devout companion. She enters the ark with no incident.\textsuperscript{330} Obviously,

\textsuperscript{327}Swenson, op. cit., p. 7.

\textsuperscript{328}Block, op. cit., p. xxvi; also, Howard R. Patch, "The Lucas Coventriae and the Digby Massacre," Publications of the Modern Language Association, XXXV (July, 1920), 338. See also meter in this latter work.

\textsuperscript{329}Thomas Blake Clark, op. cit., p. 160.

\textsuperscript{330}Bates, op. cit., p. 121.
there is no comic element associated with her, or for that matter, any means by the dramatist to expand her character. The general feeling about the absence of comic elements in this play is summarized by Block, who suggests that their absence makes the cycle an independent one. The remaining parts of the play (241-253) come quickly, as the scene shifts to the ark, where Noah relates the familiar dove episode, and together the family join him in a song of praise to God.

Aside from this Lameth scene, however, there is very little plot expansion or character development. There is, as well, no extended detail of the flood, ark, or scenery; in a dramatic sense, the author appears to assign speeches to each character but does not allow for much independent expression. There would seem to be little trouble, then, in one's recognizing that realistic detail was never intended, with the exception of Lameth. The characters show that they know their religion well, and to this end they seem to satisfy the author's purpose. Thus, one must throw out the theory that the play is purely didactic and expresses no innate interest in Church doctrine per se. 333 It does appear, however, that the play underwent a late revision in which its plot was made to fit a strong religious intent.

\[331\] Block, op. cit., p. liii.
\[332\] Moore, op. cit., p. 41.

As to stage directions, the dramatist has equipped the cycle well. 334 The first seven plays in the cycle contain most of the Latin stage directions. 335 A theory is advanced that these directions suggest only what the audience is to see, rather than what actually happens on stage. 336 Certainly, their use was practical in that the medieval audience must always be told of a change in locale, else they may have become confused. 337 The Latin directions in Play IV tend to substantiate such a theory as they reveal a change of scenery, beginning with the "Introitus hoe," and ending with the "Introitus abrahe." Swenson feels that these two directions prove that the plays were once a unit or probably one continuous play. 338 The first direction

334 Williams, op. cit., p. 100.
335 Thomas Clark, op. cit., p. 165.
336 Thompson, op. cit., p. 20.
338 Swenson, op. cit., p. 8.
(142-143) shows Noah's family leaving to build the ark and the entrance of Lamech. Another direction (197), upon Noah's return, removes Lamech from the scene. On this stage evidence alone, Greg suggests that there must have been a fixed stage for this play.339 Two additional directions (246, 249), indicate the release and return of the dove. The final direction introduces a song but says nothing about leaving or landing the ark. Like the play itself, the directions retain an impersonal quality which suggest that the playwright was a master at such objectivity.340

One cannot hope to find absolute proof to show the way in which this play was composed or how many various revisions it may have been given. Perhaps Play IV was done by a cleric of considerable skill and originality.341 The abundance of moral and theological principles in the text might suggest that the author had access to a library, perhaps in his own religious house.342 Furthermore, there is a theory which holds that the entire manuscript was meant to be read rather than acted, since there is appended to it a detailed table of figures, including dimensions of the ark.\textsuperscript{343} It will have to suffice for now that strong religious supervision played an important part in the development of this play and in its immediate environment. The fact that Lincoln was closely associated with the Church cannot be dismissed.\textsuperscript{344} Even the well-known Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, forbade his priests to act in the local plays, but, of course, they were still performed in Lincoln Cathedral for a long time afterwards.\textsuperscript{345} Thus, it becomes evident that no better setting than Lincoln has so far been located. Until further evidence is substantiated, the question of locale will remain unsolved.

---

342 Chambers, English Literature at the Close of the Middle Ages, p. 49.

Kretzmann suggests that the Latin tag at the end of the play (\textit{Hic decantent hoc versus, Mare vidit et fusit, Jordani conversus est retrovers. Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, Sed nomen tuo da gloriam}) was used \textsuperscript{343}Gre5, Bibliographical and Textual Problems of the English Miracle Cycles, p. 143.

\textsuperscript{344}Craig, "Note on the Home of the Ludus Coventriensis," Studies in Language and Literature, Series No. I (October, 1914), 51; Craig further states that "The medieval drama is based on the service of the medieval Church," Letter of July 17, 1967 to author.

\textsuperscript{345}Speaight, op. cit., p. 23.
in the liturgy for Quinquagesima Week in reference to the "dispersion of the waters." (Psalms 114:4, 115:1)\textsuperscript{346} Of additional importance is the fact that during this Week in the Breviary there is a reference to the waters of Jordan (Mon., ii, iii).\textsuperscript{347} Most intriguing is the fact that, on a closer examination of this passage in the Breviary, one finds in Psalms 113: 3, 9, words identical to those in the play (mare vidit, et fugit: Jordanis conversus est retorrem. Non nobis. Domina, non nobis, sed nomini tuo de glori)\textsuperscript{348} This evidence would tend to substantiate the belief that the author of this play used the lectiones of the Breviary. The Lameth or Lamech character is in the Breviary on Saturday in Septuagesima Week, which is the Saturday before Sexagesima Sunday (Sat., ii, iii) and would support the reference for his purpose.

In two sections of the play (57, 83), genealogies appear in support of Greg's hypothesis of a reading play. The one, "Noe genuit Sem, Cham, and Japhet," is also in the source (Sun., i); the other, includes a \textsuperscript{346} Kretzmann, op. cit., p. 85.

\textsuperscript{347} Breviarium Romano-Seraphicum: Officis Trium Ordinum S. P. N. Francisci, Typographia Pax et Bonum, Rome, Anno Jubilari MCCCXL, p. 676.

\textsuperscript{348} See Psalm 113, pp. 79-80 in the Breviarium-Romano-Seraphicum. Taken from Vespers for Sunday.
detailed list of family names that appear on Friday of Sexagesima Week. In addition, there are several various resemblances, one of which includes God's speech, as the following parallels show:

Noah

 Necisse hominem nunc penitet me bat I made man sore doth me rewe myn handwerk to sle sore grovyth me/ but bat here synne here deth doth brewe.

Breviary

 ... It is repented him that he made man on earth.
And being touched inwardly with sorrow of heart, He said: I will destroy man, whom I have created.

(105-103)

And, in the angel's speech to Noah:

A shyp loke pou make and many a chaumyr pou xalt hroe perinne / Of suery kyndys best a cowply pou take / with-in be shypp bord here lyvys to wynne.
/ Pfor god is sore grovyd with man for his synne bat all pis wyde word xal be dreynyt with flood saff pou and bi wyff xal be kept from pis synne / and also bi children with here vertuys good.

(118-120)

As the above passages suggest, the playwright did not hold to the exact ark dimensions, which in itself shows an element of independence, indicating probably that he was at liberty to choose the materials that fit his need; or the lack of precision might be the result of scribal transmission during the number of revisions.

Sin seems to play a symbolic role throughout the play, as each character elaborates on its consequences in the scheme of salvation. For example, Noah mentions the "syn man wyl not fle" (212), while Sem, the "synne of lechory" (218), and Cham's wife, the "Rustynes of Synne" (230). The Lameth scene probably serves as the epitome of sin, thus enabling the author to show the audience exactly how far man might go in such a state. Only because Noah and his family know the real significance of sin are they "saved" from the flood. This doctrine serves to unite the play and its source and further suggests that its author had a definite theological purpose for each event.349 This unity is skillfully maintained and is but one indication of the insatiable appetite of the audience for information concerning their purpose, salvation. Fry contends that the play centers on the so-called Abuse-of-Power theme which involves the following steps: (1) Preparation for Satan; (2) The development of Redemption; (3) The protagonist's entrance and lack of divinity; (4) The conflict and destruction of the antagonist.350 While the greater portion of the play is devoted to the subject of the sin of lechery, in which the Lamethepisode is the extent of man's degradation, there is a continuous search for the Redeemer.\footnote{Ibid., p. 542.} To this end, the play retains a theological unity and pattern throughout the cycle.\footnote{Ibid., p. 527; in a conversation on July 5, 1967, Professor Fry re-stated that the play centered around Lameth, the first bigamist, and the topic of lechery, or sins of the flesh.} It seems sound to infer that this play shows the strongest clerical influence and has, for its over-all purpose, the exposition of religious principles.

---

349 This is the most common point of comparison between the Chester and Hegge cycles.

CHAPTER V

THE INDEPENDENT-UNITY OF THE NOAH PLAYS

Perhaps, the most significant approach to the study of Noah as it appears in the Chester, Hegge, York, and Towneley cycles is through a realization that each of the plays is an independent product of its own community. At the same time, this independent product becomes, as such, one play developed from a common source. Adoption of this credo allows one to examine each play according to its own influences and to determine as nearly as possible what, in respect to source, makes each play seem different. It seems valid to posit that in the case of the Noah play there has been too great an emphasis on the comic aspect of Noah's wife to the extent that other important influences have gone unnoticed.

A decidedly important feature of each play is that the plot covers about the same area and, except for individual characteristics, remains remarkably simple.353 This simplicity, as most agree, is controlled

---

353 Tatlock, op. cit., p. 3.
by a persistent logic, deeply rooted in theological principles.354 Kretzmann suggests that the mere fact "... there is such an agreement in the subjects and in the sequence of plays--argues for a common well-known source."355 To this end, the "liturgical source" has survived through the years the product of an independent growth.356

One would have to admit that these plays borrowed from the traditions of the people for whom they were intended, which method ought to indicate a certain degree of dramatic freedom.357 But, more importantly, these domestic inventions were a dramatic attempt to stress the importance of religion in practical terms of everyday occurrences.358 It seems, therefore, beyond question that one must look to each play in its native growth as well as to their major source of influence as it makes the plays liturgically one.

This study reveals, additionally, general aspects

355. Kretzmann, op. cit., p. 79; see also, Brotanek, op. cit., p. 193.
357. Brown, op. cit., p. 78.
358. Gardiner, op. cit., p. 3; see Lynn Thorndike, The History of Medieval Europe, p. 409.
about each play as it appears in its own cycle. For example, the Hegge play shows little use of realism in that it is more symbolic or suggestive in its narrative; one exception might be the Lameth-scene, but it is far surpassed by the other incidents in the play and can scarcely be representative. For the most part, then, this play shows the least amount of source deviation. In other words, it remains close to the Church liturgy. The Towneley play, on the other hand, indicates the most deviation in that its realistic description is a dominant characteristic, its characters and setting are more elaborate, and it shows an absence of symbolism.\textsuperscript{359} The Towneley author had the greatest amount of freedom and appears to be the most "modern" in his approach to the play. While the York play deviates from its source, it is not as realistic in its narrative as the Towneley play and shows little use of symbolism. The Chester play deviates from its source and shows better characterization and more domestic realism than the Hegge's edition; however, there is not a high concentration of realistic action, even with Noah's wife or the pantomine scene. The play, in general, is conservative.

\textsuperscript{359}The term, symbolism, in this context means the opposite of realistic or physical action, one that merely hints at its subject, rather than demonstrates. The term is not to be taken for Church symbolism as discussed throughout this paper.

While the medieval plays must be viewed within the general context of the Church, the major influence arises as the early Breviary provides the material with which to expand the stories into plays. 360

There remains a great deal to be done about the many problems surrounding the religious plays, several of which may never be solved. While it is impossible, here, to discuss the full subject, this present author has sought to point out one approach to the medieval play in English Literature.

---

360 Anderson, op. cit., p. 22.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Beckmann, Josef Hermann, and Ingeborg Schroth (eds.). Picture Bible of the Late Middle Ages. Bodensee: Jan Thorbecke Verlag Konstanz, 1960.

Block, K. S. (ed.). Ludus Coventriae; or the play called Corpus Christi. London: Early English Text Society, Extra Series CXX, 1922.

Breviarium Romano-Seraphicum: Officiis Trium Ordinum S. E. M. Francisci. Typographia Pax Et Bonum, Rome, Anno Jubilari MCM.

"Note on the Home of the Ludus Coventriae," Studies in Language and Literature, University of Minnesota, Series No. 1 (October, 1914), 72-83.

Foster, Francis A. "The Mystery Plays and the Northern Passion," Modern Language Notes, XXVI (June, 1911), 169-171.

---

---

Loomis, R. S., G. Cohen. "Were There Theatres in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries?" Speculum, XX (January, 1945), 92-98.

---

Salter, Frederick M. "Banns of the Chester Plays," Review of English Studies, XVI (January, 1940), 1-17; and XVI (April, 1940), 132-148.

Sharp, Thomas. A Dissertation on the Presents or Dramatic Mysteries Anciently Performed at Coventry by the Trading Companies of That City, Coventry, 1525.

Swenson, Esther L. "An Inquiry into the Composition and Structure of Ludus Coventriae with a Note on the Date of the Ludus Coventriae," Studies in Language and Literature, University of Minnesota, Series No. 1 (October, 1914), 1-71.

APPENDIX

The text of Sexagesima Week, with a parallel English translation follows. The Matins were recited in a form of dialogue in which lesson one and the versicle (α) to that lesson were said by the first leader; while the responsory (β) to lesson one was recited by the second leader. As for the second lesson, this process merely reverses itself, i.e. the second lesson was said by the second leader and so forth. Portions of the actual text that appear to the author insignificant have been deleted. (From: Breviarium Romano-Seraphicum: Officium Trium Ordinum S. P. H. Francisci, Typographia Pax Et Bonum, Rome, Anno Jubilari MDCL; and The Holy Bible: Translated from the Latin Vulgate, Douay Version of Old Testament, P. J. Kennedy & Sons, 1950.)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Dominica in Sexagesima (Ad Natutinum)</th>
<th>Sunday in Sexagesima (From Matins)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Nocturn I</td>
<td>Nocturn I</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lectio 1 Noe vero, cum quin-gentorum esset annorum, genuit Sen, Cham et Japhet. Cumque coeppissent homines multiplicari super terram et filias procreassent, videntes filii Dei filias</td>
<td>Lesson 1 And Noe, when he was five hundred years old, begot Sen, Cham, and Japheth. And after that man began to be multiplied upon the earth, and daughters were born to</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
hominum quod essent pulchræ, acceptum sibi uxorres ex omnibus quas elogerat. Dixitque Deus: Non permanebit spiritus meus in homine in æternum, quia caro est; eruntque dies illius centum viginti annorum. Digentes autem erant super terram in diebus illis. Postquam anima ingressi sunt illi Dei ad illias hominum, illa sequerunt, isti sunt potentia saeculo viri famosi.

Ex. Dixit Dominus ad Noe: Finis universae carnis venit coram me: Repulae est terra iniquitatis eorum, ut ego dispersam eos cum terra. X. Fac tibi arcam de lignis laevigatis, mansuetulis in ea facies it eam.

Incipit 11. Videns autem Deus quod multa malitia hominum esset in terra, et cuncta cogitationes cordis intenta esset ad malum, cum tempore, poenituit eum quod nimirum facisset in terra. Et tactus dolere cordis intrinsicus, Deleo, inquit, hominem quem creavi, a facie terrae, ab homine usque ad nympha, a reptilia usque ad volucres caeli; poenitet enim me facisse eos. Noe vero invent Patiam coram Domino.

Ex. Noe, vir justus atque perfectus, cum Deo communi: Et fecit omnia quae cum fecit Deus. X. Facit sibi arcam, ut salvaretus universum semen. Et fecit.

X. Quadragesimae dies et noctes aperiunt omnia et omni carne habente spiritum vitae ingressa sunt in arcam: Et clausit a foris ostium Dominus.

X. In articulo dixi illius ingressus est Noe in arcam et fillii ejus, et uxores illius et uxores filliorum ejus. - Et.

Gloria Patri.
Nocturn II

Lesson iv (omitted)

X. Nexit Ioque Hoc altare Domino, offerens super illud holocaustum; odoratusque est Dominus odorem sanctitatis et benedicit ei, dicens: Crescite, et multiplicamini, et replete terram. X. Hec ego stet dum pactum meum vobiscum, et cum semine vostro post vos.— Crescite.

Lesson v (omitted)

X. Ponam arcum meum in nubibus caeli, dixit Dominus ad Noe, Ut recordabor foederis mei guod pezigi tecum. X.
Singulari obdixero nubibus caelium, apparebit arcus nus in nubibus.

Lesson vi (omitted)

X. Fer necetipsam juravi, dict Dominus, non adjiciam ultra aquas diluvii super terram:
practi mi recordabor, Ut non perdam aquis diluvii omnem carnem. X. Arcum meum ponam in nubibus, et erit signum foederis inter me et inter terram.—
Ut. Gloria Patri.

Nocturn III

Lectio viii In illo tempore: Cum turba plurima covenirent, et de civi-tatibus properarent ad

Lesson vii At that time:

When a very great crowd was gathering together and men from every town were Jesus, dixit per similitudinem: Exitit qui seminat, seminare semen suum. Et regit.

B. Benedixit Deus Noe et filias ejus, et dixit ad eos: Crescite, et multiplieamini, et replete terram. X. Ecce ego statum pactum meum vobiscum et cum semine vostro post vos.

Lectio viii (omitted)

X. Ecce ego statum pactum meum vobiscum et cum semine vostro post vos: Neque erit deinceps diluvium dissipans terram. X. Arcum meum ponam in nubibus, et erit signum inter me et inter terram.

Series Secunda.

Lectio i. Dicit Dominus ad Noe: Ingredere tu et omnis domus tua in arcam; tecem vidi justum coram me in generatione hac. Ex omnibus animantibus mundis tolles septena, masculum et feminam; de animantibus vero immundis duo et duo, masculum et feminam. Sed et de volatilibus ocelli septena et septena masculum et feminam: ut salvetur semen super faciem universae terrae. Adhaec enim, et resorting to him, he said in a parable: The sower went out to sow his seed. And so forth.

Lectio viii (omitted)

X. Ecce ego statum pactum meum vobiscum et cum semine vostro post vos: Neque erit deinceps diluvium dissipans terram. X. I will establish my Covenant with you, and with your seed after you. Neither shall there be from henceforth a flood to waste the earth. X. I will set my boy in the clouds, and it shall be the sign of a Covenant between me, and between the earth. Neither shall there be from henceforth a flood to waste the earth.

X. When the great crowd came to Jesus, they gathered around him from the cities, he said to them by way of a parable. The Sower went out to sow his seed. X. And as he sowed some fell on the ground and brought forth fruit a hundred fold. The sower went out to sow his seed. Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit.

Monday.

Lesson i. The Lord said to Noe: Go in thou and all thy house into the ark: for thee I have seen just before men in this generation. Of all clean beasts take seven and seven, the male and the female. Of the fowls also of the air seven and seven, the male and the female: that seed may be saved upon Lectio iv. In articulo diei illius ingressus est Noe in arcam et filii ejus, uxor illius et uxores filiorum ejus. X. Delata sunt universa de terra; remansit autem solea Noe et qui cum eo erant in arca.

- Iunor.

X. Recordatus Dominus Noe, adduxit spiritum super terram, et imminuit aquae, et prohibita sunt aquae de caelis. X. Reveresque sunt aquae de terra euentes et reducentes, et coeperunt minui post centum quinguaquinta dies et.

Lectio iii. In articulo diei illius ingressus est Noe, et Sem, et Cham, et Japhet filii ejus; uxor illius et tres the face of the whole world. For yet a while, and after seven days, I will upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and I will destroy every substance that I have made, from the face of the earth.

X. In that selfsame day Noe, and his sons, his wife, and the wives of his sons went into the ark. X. Destroy all the land, but only Noe and all with him in the ark shall remain. -His wife, and the wives of the sons.

Lectio iv. And Noe did all things which the Lord had commanded him. And after the seven days were passed, the waters of the flood overflowed the earth. In the six hundredth year of the life of Noe, in the second month, in the seventeenth day of the month, all the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the flood gates of heaven were opened: And the rain fell upon the earth forty days and forty nights. X. The Lord remembered Noe, and sent his spirit upon the earth, and the waters were diminished, and He stopped the rain from the heavens. X. The waters of the heavens were stopped and they began to diminish after one hundred and fifty days. And He stopped the rain from the heavens.

Lectio iii. In that selfsame day Noe, and Sem, and Cham, and Japhet his sons: his wife, and the three wives of his sons with them, went into the ark: They and every beast according to uenores filliorum ejus cum suis in genere: ipsi et omne animal secundum genus suum, univacque vivunt in genere suo, et omne quod movetur super terram in genere suo, et omne quod movetur super terram in genere suo, quocumque volatile secundum genus suum.

Rectumque est diluvium quadragesimae diebus super terram, et multiplicatae sunt aquae, et elevavit arcam in sublima a fine.

Ubi sunt, Egeria Martyr

Lesson 1 And God remembered Noe, and all the living creatures, and all the cattle which were with him in the ark, and brought a wind upon the earth, and the waters were abated. The fountains also of the deep, and the flood gates of heaven were shut up and the rain from heaven was restrained. And the waters returned from off the earth going and coming; and they began to be abated after a hundred and fifty days. And the ark rested in the seventh month, the seventh and twentieth day of the month, upon the mountains of Armenia.

(Ex and N. omitted)

Lesson 2 And the waters were going and decreasing until the tenth month: for in the tenth month, the first day of the month, the tops of the mountains appeared. And after that forty days were passed, Noe opening the window of the ark which he had made, sent forth a raven: Which
R. Ae claravit Noe altare Domini, offerens super illud holocaustum; odoratus est Dominus odorem sanctitatis et benedixit ei, dicens: Crescite, et multiplicamini, et replete terram.

Lesson ii At vero aquae ibant et decrescebant usque ad decimum mensem; decimo enim mensis, prima die mensis, apparuerunt cuma montium. Cunque transissent quadraginta dies, aperierit Noe fenestram arcae quam fecerat, dimisit corvum; qui agressus eos et non revertebatur, donee siccarentur aquae super terram. Misit quocumque columbam post eum, ut videret si jam cessassent aquae super faciem terrae. Quae cum non invenisset ubi requiesceret pes ejus, reversa est ad eum in arcam.

Lesson iii Et recordabor foederis mei quod pepigi tecum. N. Quoque obduxero nubibus caelum, apparet arcus meus in nubibus.

Lesson iii Exspectatis autem ultra septem diebus alios, rursus dimisit columbam ex arca. At illa venit ad eum ad vesperam, portans ramum olivae, virentibus foliis, in ore suo. Intelleterit ergo Noe quod cessassent aquae super terram; exspectavitque nihilominus septem alios dies, et emisit columbam, went forth and did not return till the waters were dried up upon the earth. He sent forth also a dove after him, to see if the waters had now ceased upon the face of the earth. But she, not finding where her foot might rest, returned to him into the ark.

($ and $ omitted)

Lesson iii And having waited yet seven other days, he again sent forth the dove out of the ark. And she came to him in the evening, carrying a bough of an olive tree, with green leaves, in her mouth. Noe therefore understood that the waters were ceased upon the earth. And he stayed yet other seven days: and he sent forth the dove, which returned not any more unto him. Therefore in the six hundredth and first year, the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were lessened upon the earth.

R. I have sworn says the Lord, that I will not bring the waters of the flood upon the earth again: I will be mindful of my Covenant. Never again shall the waters become a flood to destroy all flesh.

N. I will set my bow in the clouds, and it shall be the sign of a Covenant between me, and between the earth. Gloria be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit.

Lectio ii Aedificavit autem Noe altare Domino: et tolleus de cunctis pecoribus et volucribus mundis, obtulit holocausta super altare. Odoratusque est Dominus odorem suavitatis et sensum enim et cogitatio hominis cordis in malum prona sunt ab adolescentia sua: non igitur ultra per-cutiam omnem animam viventem sicut feci. Cunctis diebus terrae, sementis et messis, frigus et aestus, aestas et hiems, nox et dies non requiescent. E.
Ecce ego statuam pactum meum vobiscum, et cum semine vestro post vos, Neque erit delinquens diluvium dissipans terram. Arcum meum ponam in nubibus, et erit signum foederis inter me et inter terram.
Lectio iii Benedixitque Deus Noe et filiis ejus. Et dixit ad eos: Crescite, et multiplicamini, et replete terram. Et terror vester ac terror sit super cuncta animalia terrae, et super omnes volucres caeli, cum universis, quae move-tur super terram. Omnes pisces maris manu vestrae traditi sunt; et omne quod movetur et vivit, erit vobis in cibum: quasi olera virentia tradidi vobis omnia. Excepto quod car-num cum sanguine non comedetis. Sanguinem enim animalium viventium requiram de manu cunctarum bestirum; et de manu hominis, de manu viri, et fratris ejus requiram animam hominis.
Quicumque effuderit humanum sanguinem, fundetur sanguis illius; ad imagi-num quippe Dei factus est homo. E. In articulo diei waste the earth.
Lesson iii And God blessed Noe and his sons. And he said to them: Increase and multiply, and fill the earth. And let the fear and dread of you be upon all the beasts of the earth, and upon all the fowls of the air, and all that move upon the earth:
all the fishes of the sea are delivered. And every ting that moveth and liveth shall be meat for you: even as the green herbs have I delivered them all to you. Saving that flesh with blood you shall not eat. For I will require the blood of your lives at the hand of every beast, and at the hand of man, at the hand of every man, and of his brother, will I require the life of man. Whosoever shall shed man's blood, his blood shall be shed: for man was made to the image of God.
(E. omitted)

Thursday
Lesson 1 And God said: This is the sign of the Covenant which I give between me and you, and to every living soul that is with you, for perpetual generations. I will set my bow in the clouds, and it shall be the sign of a Covenant between me, and between the earth. And when I shall cover the sky with clouds, my bow shall appear in the clouds; And I will remember my Covenant with you, and with every illius ingressus est Noe in arcam et filii ejus, Uxor illius et uxores filiorum ejus. N. Deleta sunt universa de terra; remansit autem solus Noe et qui cum eo erant in arca. Uxor. Gloria Patri.

Feria Quinta

Lectio i Dixitque Deus: Hoc signum foederis quod do inter me et vos, et ad omnem animam viventem, quae est vobiscum in generationes sempiternas: Arcum meum ponam in nubibus, et erit signum foederis inter me et inter terram. Cumque obduxero nubibus caelum, apparebit arcus meus in nubibus; et recordabor foederis mei vobiscum et cum omni anima vivente quae carnem vegetat: et non erunt ultra aquae diluvii ad delendum universam carnem. N. Dixit Dominus ad Noe: Finis universae carnis venit coram me: repleta est terra iniquitate eorum, Et ego disperdam eos cum terra. N. Fac tibi arcam de lignis laevigatis, monsunculas in ea facies. Lectio ii Coepitque Noe vir agricola exercere terram, et nudatus in tabernaculo suo. Quod cum odisset Cham pater Chanaan, verenda scilicet patris sui esse nudata, muntiavit duobus fratribus suis foras. At vero Sem et Japheth pallium imposuerunt humeris suis, et incedentes retrorsum operuerunt verenda patris sui: faciesque eorum aversae erant, et patris virilia non viderunt. N. Noe, vir justus atque perfectus, cum Deo ambulavit, Et fecit living soul that beareth flesh: and there shall no more be waters of a flood to destroy all flesh. N. God said to Noe: The end of all flesh is come before me, the earth is filled with iniquity through them, and I will destroy them with the earth. N. Make thee an ark of timber planks, make little rooms in it. I will destroy them with the earth.

Lesson ii And Noe, a husbandsman, began to till the ground, and planted a vineyard. And drinking of the wine was made drunk, and was uncovered in his tent. Which when Cham, the father of Chanaan had seen, to wit, that his father's nakedness was uncovered, he told it to his two brethren without. But Sem and Japheth put a cloak upon their shoulders, and going backward, covered the nakedness of their father: and their faces were turned away, and they saw not their father's nakedness.

Lesson iii And Noe, a just and perfect man, he walked with God: And did all whatever God directed. N. Build the Ark, and save all the seeds. And did all whatever God directed.

Lesson iii And Noe awaking from the wine, when he had learned what his younger son had done to him, He said: Cursed be Chanaan, a servant of omnis quaecumque praecepit ei Deus. N. Facit sibi arcam, ut salvetur universum semen. Et fecit omnia quaecumque praecepit ei Deus.