"WITH A MYTHICAL BEAST / STUNG IN MY BREAST":

KAY CLOSSON -- THE ARTIST AS WOMAN

by

L. K. Nine

The following article will attempt to explain the creative forces of Kay Closson -- wife, mother, poet, short story writer, singer, piano player, guitar plucker, critic-reviewer, ad writer, song writer, novelist, teacher, student and human being -- through the discussion of several of her poems. In that she is a creature of nature, nature is involved. In that she has mostly lived in Kansas, geography determines her creative environment. In that she is a woman, her gender influences her work. The progressions and movements of her physical, emotional, logical, and musical life are reflected in her artistic creations. These movements and progressions are cyclic and involve the natural harmonies of the seasons of nature and life.

Some biographical information about Kay Closson will be necessary in that the style and content of her written works are often determined by what occurs in her personal life. Kay Closson, born Donna Kay Long, was born in Hutchinson, Kansas on October 18, 1937. As a result of contracting polio at the age of four, she spent her childhood fairly isolated from the world of other children. Her parents, relatives, tutors, the many weeks she had to spend in hospital and the treatment she received then were the major influences on how she came to view the world.

Her early education was private. The piano became a method of expression; she started training for a possible concert career. In college, as a music major, she realized that there were other areas of personal expression that were being neglected -- her love of people, her intellectual interests, and her writings. As she turned to nourish her writings, the concert dreams fell aside. Closson's poetry now sounds the chords of the music of her life. The notes are spectacular, riveting, compelling, and meaningful.

Kay Closson's written works, which span twenty-seven years, from the spring of 1951 until the spring of 1978, provide the major insights into her creative abilities. Some of her works have been published in journals, newspapers, and magazines such as the Smith, Squeeze Box, Microkosmos, the Sunflower, Gazebo, Ms. (two poems written in collaboration with Anita Skeen), Ontario Review, Duck, and Saltillo. Another source of information for this article is a series of conversations between Kay and me which began in August, 1977 and continued until April, 1978.

Perhaps the best way to begin a discussion on the difficulties of being both a creative artist and a woman is to illustrate one major problem with one of Kay's poems and examine the attitude expressed there.

straws and pebbles in my lifetime I have known sunsets, excellent sex and mountains but much of my time is used up by straws and pebbles

I do dishes and laundry while poems sing inside my skull scrub floors to use up my lust stir cocoa while tilting with dragons of green, gold and silver

I try to remain content camouflage myself in straws and pebbles; so clever that I cannot find my own eyes in the mirror

During one of the conversations with Kay, she revealed that the expression "straws and pebbles" is borrowed from a statement by Anne Morrow Lindbergh. Lindbergh used the expression to symbolize the ordinary daily tasks necessary for comfortable existence. That the poet must spend precious time on the mundane chores -- dishes, laundry, scrubbing of floors -- when her imaginative, creative, and sexual energies are begging for release creates a conflict that is unique for the woman as poet. Traditionally, the male poet has a place for creative work and a wife who takes care of the housework, the children, the telephone, his typing and filing, the errands, and his ego. Kay, as mother to Kathleen (age 18), to Eric (age 12), and to Joel (a very busy 5 year old), as wife of Jed, and as poet, must play her family roles first and her creative roles second -- her office is where her work is, a corner of the living room. The last stanza of "straws and pebbles" expresses another aspect of the results of the conflict between having to spend time on chores and not being able to spend time on the poet's other needs. She tries to remain content but by doing so is not being true to herself. It seems almost good that the poet has camouflage her own eyes so well; for if she could see the pain of the disappointment reflected by her own eyes, the conflict would be greater than what is expressed.

"Desperate for harvest," another poem from the unpublished Bordello Songs, reveals the difficulties that the poet encounters when trying to write while at the same time trying to relate to the many other facets of her life. This is one of the very few poems that mentions the poet's children; she rarely mentions specific family members in her poems. Although Closson might use "you" to indicate desperate for harvest the cold bothers me this year my children's noises break the air it is increasingly difficult to find the bridge between these pages and the rest of my life

desperate for harvest
i work this page as though it were the earth itself you ask me what is this poem about and i cannot tell you that it is about your breaking me into fragments and tossing me to the winds like so much confetti

if you were to lift the poem from the page, peeling it layer by layer you would see life, damp and fecund with grubs, rotting leaves and white shoots of grass

On one level, the poem is a lament about the difficulties of writing; on another level, the poem concerns the creation and destruction cycles of nature, art, and the poet herself. Nature, in the form of weather, bothers the poet. The children's noises, which are distractions -- not necessarily annoyances -- infringe upon the poet's writing time. The last four lines of the first stanza almost give the impression that the poet is nearly ready to give up on either the writing or the rest of her life. "Bridge" becomes a powerful word in this stanza as a link between the nature outside and the nature inside the poet. In the second stanza the poet exhibits great strength to contrast with her weakness in the first through the connotations of biological and artistic images. She will "work this page as though / it were the earth itself," which suggests the plowing, sowing, nourishing, growing, and, finally, the harvest. As a woman, she must do this for her children; as an artist, she must do this for her art. The processes are an integral and necessary part of both art and nature. The third stanza is layered -- the literal, the "you" in the poem, either personal or rhetorical, is creating a psychological conflict for the poet; the subtle, the fragmentation of the poet is like that of clods of earth thrown by the plow with the confetti referring to the earlier "page"; the more subtle, the poet's fragmentation makes her a seed to be sown for creation; the allusion, that there is, here, an unconscious reference to the Isis-Osiris creation myth.
The fourth stanza returns to the poem and allows it to be peeled, like a fruit or vegetable of nature, to reveal the realities of life and art -- "grubs, rotting/leaves and white shoots of grass," which can be interpreted as images indicating parasites, death-destruction, and birth-creation.

Closson protests the housewife role in a more recent poem entitled "List." The poem begins as a grocery shopping list. Then, the list is interrupted by indented lines which explain that the poet writes poems, stories, and novels. These indented lines are inter­ rupled by the continued shopping list. Then, the indented lines contain another indentation which is more prose than poetry and which is, itself, indented for another list. Lines which specifically refer to the problems of the writer as woman are:

sometime I live inside a brown bag, holes torn for my extending arms to perform their tasks. . . recently, during what my therapist refers to as one of my hypomanic phases (I prefer to think of it as a period of intense creativity) I was a butterfly not yet dry in the sun . . .

With the last lines of the poem the poet threatens to make a list to "Pack bags. . . Call cab/Catch the 2:19, non-stop." Is it any wonder that Closson, who pulls a thirty pound vacuum cleaner with her eighty pound body, who cooks three meals a day, does dishes, nurses sick children, listens to the family's hopes and fears, breaks up the children's squabbles, performs the wifely duties for her husband, who is in constant danger of injury from falls of misplaced crutches, whose own health is so very fragile, would want to make a list to "Pack bags. . . Call cab/Catch the 2:19, non-stop?" But the woman, as the poet, makes the list a poem and goes about fulfilling her duties and living her life.

Up to this point the discussion has concentrated on the difficulties encountered by Closson, the poet as woman, in the roles of wife and mother. It is not that the poet does not want to accept the responsibilities of her many roles; she does, in fact, accept them, but that the need to create her art demand recognition and the conflict becomes a struggle with the juggling of priorities. The complaint involves mostly lack of time -- there never exists enough time to do all that needs to be done.

One of the female artist's . . . abilities is that not only can she give birth to a work of art, as can her male counterpart, but low with the confetti referring from the poet's fragmentation the illusion, that there the Isis-Osiris creation myth.
and allows it to be peeled,
the poet's fragmentation reveal the realities of life and the poesy, death-destruction,
and allows it to be peeled,
the poet's fragmentation
and allows it to be peeled,
the poet's fragmentation
the Isis-Osiris creation myth.

the role in a more recent poem a grocery shopping list. Then as which explains that the poet These indented lines are inter-Then, the indented lines more prose than poetry and list. Lines which specifically woman are:
a brown bag, holes arms to perform their during what my one of my hypomanic ink of it as a period of was a butterfly not yet et threatens to make a list to 2:19, non-stop." Is it any by pound vacuum cleaner with as meals a day, does dishes, myth's hopes and fears, breaks the swiftly duties for her hus-jury from falls of misplaced fragile, would want to make Catch the 2:19, non-stop?* list a poem and goes about has concentrated on the diffic-et as woman, in the roles of doest not want to accept the does, in fact, accept them, mand recognition and the changing of priorities. The com-there never exists enough time ue abilities is that not only can her male counterpart, but that she can give birth in nature. Sometimes the birth is not exactly what is anticipated, as is shown in the poem "anniversary":

anniversary

her heartbeat undetectable I became a coffin for ten days a carrier of death more ultimate than the plague I remember that last vibrant leap inside me, how the lack of movement followed like silence on the tenth day you donned your healing robes and plastic hands I saw how tightly the muscles contracted around your eyes cold sleep crept up my left arm, spread the length and breadth of my tongue the huge circle of light began spinning, taking the very core of my brain with it I felt myself falling into space as in a dream, unable to scream for help a few deft touches of your knife and I danced crazily into a sterile bed, very flat after nine wasted moons perhaps it would have been easier had I not given her a name.

Although the experience of giving birth to a dead child is one shared by many women, it is an unique experience for the female artist. It is the creation-destruction cycle complete in one act. As an act of woman, it comes at great emotional and physical expense.
Unlike the creation of the "perfect" piece of art, then its destruction, which would produce emotional consequences for any artist, the creative growth of the fetus involves the very cells of the female artist's body and mind. Crosson's "anniversary," although very personal, does not pound at the reader for sympathy. The tone is such that the poem seems to calm, cool, matter-of-fact description of a stillbirth. "anniversary" leaves the emotion to the reader with the possible exception of these lines: "how the lack of / movement followed like silence." The final stanza hints at more about the sorrow of death than it actually says. The poet's use of understatement is as effective in this poem as it is in many others.
During 1974, Clossen and her family lived on a farm near Augusta, Kansas. Inspired by the farm, she wrote a collection of yet unpublished poems called To Name the Bird from Its Shadow. Most of these poems deal specifically with nature's creative and destructive cycles. Many of the poems explore the realities of farm life and the objects of nature associated with farms. At the farm, her life was both traumatic and relaxed; she loved and hated the isolation. One of her more pleasant experiences was seeing so much of nature so closely. Although the volume of poems has not been published, the poem "I seldom find what I seek" does appear in the 1975 spring/summer edition of Saltillo.

```
I seldom find what I seek while searching for bees I saw smoke and ran not only Curly's field in flames but ours as well for the fire had jumped the road
you were driving home when you saw the smoke sweat dripped down your back before you even reached the fire you thought it was the house all that night you dozed in the truck with fifty-five gallon drums of water and a shovel as it was we lost the sandplums and you spent several days mending fence
```

Farmers, like the one mentioned in the poem, must try to protect their own property since there are no fire departments every few blocks. He must mend his own fences fast if he has livestock; he cannot afford to wait for an insurance check. The many details mentioned in the poem are those that can be ascertainred from the speaker's stance, are a calm reflection of facing the necessities of farm life. The speaker of the poem lets it be known that there are two possible panic points -- when the speaker discovers the fire (although she runs, she does not desist) and when the "you" discovers the fire. The situation does not warrant panic, but it does her family lived on a farm near form, she wrote a collection of se the Bird from Its Shadow ally with nature's creative and ems expose the realities of associated with farms. At the relaxed; she loved and hated stant experiences was seeing so p the volume of poems has not find what i seek," does appear of Saltillo.
what i seek for bees

e field

l jumped g home

he smoke

before

d the fire

e

you

nick jallon drums

shovel

sandplums

several days the poem, must try to protect a fire departments every few ces fast if he has livestock; ence check. The many details ot be ascertained from the ution of facing the necessities of lets it be known that there are the speaker discovers the fire seet) and when the "you" dis-not warrant panic, but it does require action. We are relieved to discover that the fire's damage seems to be limited to the sandplum thicket and the fence.

Another poem from To Name the Bird from Its Shadow which deals with creative nature is "nexus."

nexus

i kneel upon the earth sowing in the seeds make peace with the newly-horned ram and the two-months colt able to name all sounds draw them to me as i would children

i wait for the first rain after planting

This poem enchants with its simplicity and peacefulness, which is reminiscent of Genesis. The speaker of the poem sows the seeds, names the sounds, then awaits the natural nourishment of rain. The creative planting becomes a joint effort of woman and nature.

Kay Closson's "wind change," also from To Name the Bird from Its Shadow, describes a part of nature common to Kansas and the plains states.

wind change

fields of dust rise, cross roads into my eyes, nose down my throat the dry sienna fog moves fast layers everything my skin apparent with it dust fills the sky removes fences, sheds, the barn a few feet of clear space constrict around me i reach out try to maintain territory but dust sits through my fingers no matter how quickly i make fists 50 when I can see nothing i tumble inward grasping my breath shallow through a damp rag

Since it seems that the wind never stops blowing in Kansas, the title, "wind change," indicates either a change in direction or speed. In this case, the literal explication of the poem indicates that the wind has delivered a dust storm. The speaker of the poem accurately describes the physical elements of the storm and portrays common human reactions to it. When the speaker's skin becomes layered with dust, it is time to consider the possibility that the dust from the natural storm may be hiding another kind of storm. It is possible that the dust storm symbolizes personal trauma or conflict. If Closson's poems are peeled back, they often reveal a subtle layer or two beneath the literal. The poet admits that sometimes she deliberately conceals another meaning beneath the surfaces of her poems.

Another poem relevant to the realities of farm life is "the gleaners," from To Name the Bird from Its Shadow.

the gleaners

we found the four-months calf near the creek in the west field dead

took it for autopsy and we watched as the entrails spilled onto pink grass rubies shone from the vet's clear plastic gloves as he made his divinations the heart emerged next enlarged

heart and entrails stuffed back into their cavity the skin laid across the opening just as flake began to gather laboring we picked up the calf by its tail and legs gave a mighty swing to get it back into the truck missed the calf’s head wobbled crazily in disbelief now a broken neck as we swung again we got the calf into the truck then headed home for division?

Although the death of a young calf is both unfortunate and a cash loss for the farmer, the practicalities of life are observed in taking the calf for an autopsy to make sure the meat would be suitable for human consumption. The incidents after the calf’s death, which in itself is humiliating enough for any dead beast, become a bizarre experience. The details of the autopsy, of the gathering of slices, then of the breaking of the dead calf’s neck hardly seem conductive to good eating, however practical it may be.

Closson repeats many words and images with varying degrees of similarity. For example, the word “fragmented” appears in various forms in many of her poems. Often the speaker of the poem feels as if the fragmentation is personal—psychological or physical—as in “desperate for harvest.” In “vortex,” a poem that on the surface describes the effects of a tornado, which is a common element of the climate of Kansas, the speaker of the poem says that “after the rains move on” she will “walk down the drive sorting fragments.” In this poem the fragments refer to both the speaker of the poem and the things of nature disturbed by the storm. The poet’s adeptness at double or triple meanings of words, images, and entire poems exhibits itself frequently. In “you missed the rainbow” the poet floats out the dar into the “soft rain” before fragmenting. The consequences of fragmentation are shown through gentle images. She tells the reader that “If you don’t catch me” soon “you may have to wait for the next rainbow.”

Another image which frequently appears in Kay Closson’s poems is the composite image of light and sight. Light, for Closson, represents a revelation of truth; it, also, shows the relativity of truth. In many instances, light is used as a tool “to magnify or reveal allusions through physical constants.” In “loving” the speaker of the poem describes the overwhelming power of truth through light images:

... polished by our hunger for light each surface a careful plane to catch the warm sun we gather light as trappers acquire pelts light courses toward us with contrived promise blinding, charring
It burns craters right through our flesh to the marrow, infects us we will never be the same again.

Vision in "loving" becomes obscured by the smoke from the revelation in the next stanza of the poem. Sometimes, light illuminates; sometimes, it destroys.

Kay Closson's repetitive use of falling and space imagery reflects her own needs for personal space. When one shares space with others, a value becomes attached to space. Closson, as an artist, must have that space, with defined boundaries, to create; as a woman, she must have that space to organize the family and the roles she must play. When the boundaries of her space are violated, she must, essentially restructure her life. In the poem "a scent occurs within my head," she does restructure her space with these lines:

i left, you did not believe i would, all the reasons of my loving had spent themselves on you until at last the sun exploded our world was scattered through our space and time and neither of us could span the distances.

Within this poem, physical space images are presented through the description of rooms and psychological space images through the thought processes of the speaker of the poem.

Three of the more interesting images that reappear in Kay Closson's poems are those of Pegasus, the unicorn, and the phoenix. Kay explained that when she returned to Kingman, Kansas after her hospital treatments, one of the first things which indicated that she was safely home was the Texaco sign. In "Smokey the Bear died last Tuesday," the death of Smokey provokes images of Pegasus.

Smokey the Bear died last Tuesday replaced two years before his death part of my passage from childhood like Burma Shave and that red-winged Pegasus poised for flight from the high bluff outside my hometown flesh fects us the same again. 9

Sometimes, light illuminates:

of falling and space imagery space. When one shares space with the smoke from the reve-

Sometimes, light illuminates:

Although she does not explain the personal significance of Pegasus in the poem, Pegasus operates as the chief image of the poem in memory of Smokey.

The unicorn appears calmly in unexpected places. In "I sit watching you move" the speaker of the poem says "day after day he visits/ inside her head/ while she tames unicorns." In another poem, "cage" the speaker of the poem laments her entrapment behind a wire mesh. She learns to adjust to the cage and to perform from her bondage:

...
my tongue became a long coil inside my mouth and when the pacing stranger closed its eyes, I gently sent my tongue to the edge of a little pond, waited for the unicorn to dip his lovely horn into the water, brought the purified liquid to my mouth, one drop at a time through the night. 12

In an unfinished and untitled poem written January 3, 1974, Closson gives more information about unicorns:

Done with toast crumbs for the day, I work, waiting for the unicorn to keep his appointment.

Hysterically, dogs bark as I make my bed.
I run, hoping that the unicorn will wait until I brush my hair.

The door of my shelter is open and ready, I look,
trembling
as the unicorn pauses in front of my gate.
All the neighbors have run into their yards.
I hesitate, knowing that the unicorn has come for me and I...

(unfinished fragments on next page) that if I don't leave now, the unicorn will never come that this is the last that even a unicorn that once you ride a unicorn that if the unicorn takes me, I will not be back. that the unicorn pauses but never hesitates waits will not wait the neighbors and I return to our shelters.

Jed Closson, Kay's husband, an artist in his own right, made Kay a small unicorn. In the poem "slipping in and out of fever dreams," the speaker of the poem impales herself on a unicorn given her by the person she addressed as "you." It is from this poem and those lines that the title of this article is taken.

In the poem originally entitled "phoenix, you terrible bird," which is now called "rising," the speaker of the poem claims "we are birds rising/from ashes of our own device." The phoenix, by its own nature, both creates and destroys itself. It is fitting that Closson uses it as a symbol to explain her own creativity in "circle this rim of disaster," a poem from her yet unfinished and unpublished volume entitled "fire turning to ice:

...In seasons of wildfire I rise from my own ashes, a myth even to myself.

These particular losses I cannot sustain indefinitely, so I write this song for swans to sing: the death rattle of my infancy; the snake in my dreams. Many have come this far with such incredible resilience and merciful perseverance.

Listen for the song in the steady beat of your heart at midnight; rise, a sleeper singing with the sleepless; rise time and time again until all the deaths are done and all the fires have turned to ice.

In an earlier version of the same poem, Kay makes this statement: Kay Closson, as the woman and as the poet, creates from two perspectives—nature and art: her creations, both natural and artifact, are unique and unusual. Her creative processes parallel the rhythms of nature, define and discuss nature, and exist in nature; her artistic abilities illuminate, expand, and provide growth in her personal life. Almost like the phoenix, her life is re-created by her art each day. Creation, itself, is a great strain as Kay illustrates with "fire turning to ice," from the volume fire turning to ice. This poem presents many of the views and feelings Kay has about writing:

fire turning to ice

I saw firefighters creating ice sculptures under hazardous conditions.

I, too, create under hazardous conditions; no extra pay; the fatality rate much higher in my profession than in theirs.

My poems are shimmers and rainbows of heat; they turn in the sun and cast shadows; they are weapons they ignite fires and extinguish them, but most often they break and dam and drown me.

If only there were safety gear or sets of rules I could depend upon to establish appropriate moments for taking risk.

Watch out. Here it comes.
Escape while you can
And never look back;
I am fire turning to ice.

In "fire turning to ice" Closson discusses the difficulty of creation. Her creations become instruments of both pleasure and pain for her. Kay Closson's poetry is a magical record of woman as artist as woman.

Someday, when the demands of the many roles her lives diminish, when she can devote more of her time and energy to writing, we may expect to see Kay Closson seated on the back of a fresh unicorn on the evening news.
NOTES

1 Kay Closson, Bordello Songs, p. 16.
2 Kay Closson, interview-conversation, November 12, 1977.
4 Kay Closson, Bordello Songs, p. 9.
5 Kay Closson, Gazebo, Spring, 1978.
6 Kay Closson, interview-conversation, November 12, 1977.
9 Kay Closson, Bordello Songs, p. 1.
12 Kay Closson, "Cage."
13 Kay Closson, Bordello Songs, p. 12.
14 Kay Closson, Bordello Songs, p. 36.